The city took its first look at a proposal to change residential zoning laws to improve the appearance of city homes. The new law would make it illegal to have furniture in yards or on porches.

Differences in the electric car

The electric car converted by Soleq Corp. has an average driving range of 40 miles and is heavier than a gas-powered car. The battery and battery tray alone weigh 1,000 pounds.

DRIVE IT HOME, PLUG IT IN

K-State researcher tests battery-powered car, drives it daily

STORIES BY BRENT JOHNSON • STAFF REPORTER

Jim Hague slides behind the wheel of his Ford Escort and inserts the key into the ignition. He turns the key, and there is no sound. He presses the accelerator, and there is no sound.

Hague never has to stop at a gas station or check a gas gauge. When he gets home, he uses an extension cord to plug his car into the wall socket.

Hague is an associate professor at K-State who is researching electric cars.

His car looks like any other Ford Escort until you open the hood. This Escort has an electric-powered motor so what you see when you open the hood are six batteries and lots of cables.

The Escort is an electric-powered vehicle, getting its power from the 18 lead-acid six-volt batteries, said Rod Urbanek, research assistant for the K-State Electric Vehicle Site Operator Program. The batteries are situated in both the front and the back of the car.

The K-State Site Operator Program is part of a national electric and hybrid vehicle-research program that is headed by the U.S. Department of Energy.

K-State is one of the 13 sites in America that participates in the national Site Operator Users Task Force. The role of K-State is to test and evaluate the electric vehicles.

K-State owns two electric Ford Escorts. The Escort's were purchased by K-State for research in the Site Operator Program.

"We're basically testing and evaluating the technology and performance of the Escorts," said Hague, associate professor of architectural engineering and construction science. "In addition to our research, we take our vehicles all over the nation to display and promote electric-vehicle technology."

Both Hague and Urbanek drive the Escorts daily to record and evaluate data on the vehicles. They compile data and submit quarterly reports to the Department of Energy, Kansas Electric Utilities Research Program and to other program participants.

"I drive the vehicle around town mostly on errands and stuff," Urbanek said. "I try to drive the vehicle around 20 miles a day."

The Escorts were converted to electric power by Soleq Corp. in Chicago, along with the assistance from former K-State students.

"All major service and repairs are done by Soleq under warranty," Urbanek said. "Any minor problems we try to fix through trouble-shooting."

"It can be difficult because this is new technology, and there isn't a manual."

A majority of the funds used to purchase the vehicles were provided by the U.S. Department of Energy and Kansas Electric Utilities Research Program.

The K-State Site Operator Program has been under con-

GROUND-BREAKING EVENT SET FOR 1ST ELECTRIC-VEHICLE PLANT

Ground-breaking ceremonies for the first volume manufacturing plant for electric vehicles in the world is scheduled for 4 p.m. today.

Troy Design and Manufacturing Co., a company from Redford, Mich., has a contract with Ford Motor Co. to manufacture a minimum of 2,000 electric Ford Rangers.

The ground-breaking ceremonies will be at the plant's future location in the Manhattan Industrial Park on Levee Drive.

The 40,000 to 60,000-square-foot plant has a deadline to be open and certified to manufacture vehicles by Feb. 15.

James Hague, associate professor of architectural engineering and construction, said K-State will receive the first Ranger produced at the new TDM plant.

K-State has put in an order for a minimum of four electric Rangers, which will be used for research.

TDM choose the Manhattan site over locations all over the nation.

"This is extraordinarily important to Manhattan," President Jon Wefald said.

"Their location here might be the single-most important company to locate in Manhattan or the state since 1945," he said.

Bill Coppola, managing director of electric vehicle development for TDM, said TDM chose Manhattan because of research programs at K-State, the strong support of Kansas utility companies and the community of Manhattan.

TDM will hire 52 to 67 employees in the first year. Production line workers will make about $17 per hour.

Composites not accurate in rape case

Carl Cornelson
staff reporter

Computer composites of the two rape suspects who assaulted a 23-year-old Roeland Park woman Sunday morning were not close representations and will not be released, Capt. Steve French of the Riley County Investigations Division.

He said the victim was not happy with the end result of the computer-generated composite, which was created with the descriptions the victim gave investigators.

"I'm afraid it would be a misdirection," French said.

Hopefully, the police will be able to create a new composite in about a week, he said.

The victim has returned to her home in Roeland Park and is going to take a week off work, French said.

He said the victim was in Manhattan for the Missouri vs. K-State game Oct. 7.

The rape occurred inside the Sigma Chi fraternity house between 4 and 4:26 a.m. The police were contacted after the housemother, Vicki Morgan, heard cries for help from the victim.

French said two men followed the victim into the Sigma Chi house and took her into a common area near the foyer, where the assault occurred.

The two suspects are described as black men in their early 20s, with short, cropped hair.

They were wearing dark clothing at the time of the assault. The suspect who investigators said they believe raped the victim is about 5 feet 8 inches tall and 180 pounds.

The other suspect, who investigators said they believe was the lookout, is about 6 feet 1 inch and 185 pounds.

The suspects are not members of Sigma Chi.

Activities leader resigns

Gina Buster
staff reporter

The coordinator of student activities announced her resignation Tuesday night to Student Senate.

Tricia Nolfi, coordinator of Student Activities and Services, accepted the position of assistant dean of student activities at Rutgers University in New Jersey on Monday. Nolfi's last day at K-State will be Nov. 10.

Nolfi said she will miss K-State and its students.

"The students in government are very bright and very committed," she said. "The University is great."

"I've enjoyed working with all of you. K-State students are one of the best groups I've ever worked with."

At Rutgers University, Nolfi will be able to oversee different areas that she wouldn't have been able to at K-State because of the structure of the University.

Aaron Otto, arts and sciences senator, asked Senate members to reflect on what Nolfi had accomplished in 2-1/2 years on campus.

"When Tricia came in, the office was a mess, and leadership was in chaos. I'd like everyone to take time to reflect on all she has done for us because of her organization, excitement and go-get-'em attitude."

"She's a hell of a trooper, and our lives are a little better because we had a chance to know Tricia Nolfi," Otto said.

It has not been decided whether a permanent replacement will be hired right away or if the position will be filled temporarily, Nolfi said.

The first readings of five allocation bills for student groups were then presented.

If passed, the money to fund these five groups will come from the Senate reserves for contingency account for spring 1996.

College Republicans requested $800.80, and the recommendation given by the Allocations Committee was $766.30.

The amount requested by the Chi Alpha Christian Fellowship was $1,260, and the amount recommended was $979.40.

Mortar Board National Honor

Society requested $709.40, and $701.90 was recommended.

Otto asked if Mortar Board was funded by Senate last year.

John Gaither, Allocations Committee intern, said the group didn't come forward last year because they didn't know they could get any funds.

Trent LeDoux, agriculture senator, asked several times during the evening how much money was in the reserve total and how much would be left after the recommendations.

Chris Avila, Student Governing Association treasurer, said a little more than $85,000 was in the reserve. He said he did not know exactly how much would be left after the allocations.

Alpha Phi Omega's budget request was $122.50, and the committee recommended $51. The biggest cuts came in advertising and postage.

Alpha Phi Omega requested $40 for advertising, but the committee recommended no money be allotted for that purpose.

Reporter addresses domestic terrorism

Katie Thomas

A hostile nuclear incident will soon take place in the United States, a Pulitzer Prize-nominated investigative reporter said Tuesday at Union Forum Hall.

"It is inevitable that there will be a nuclear explosion in the U.S. in the next five years," Dale Van Atta said in his presentation titled "Terrorism and America."

The nuclear explosion will be a single, isolated incident that will probably take place in a city, he said. Van Atta has spent the last 20 years uncovering international scandals and investigating world problems like terrorism.

"America is becoming the No. 1 target for terrorism," he said.

Last year, 40 percent of all international attacks were made in the United States.

"With the breakdown of the Soviet Union, we've become masters of the world," Van Atta said.

If a nuclear explosion occurred, it would force marshal law into action and suspend the first 10 amendments to the Constitution, he said.

The new laws would include government police power, like the National Guard, watching every move made by citizens, he said.

The values of terrorists show similarities to the values of cults, Van Atta said.

"Once followers start to get in it, they start to let the leaders have power over them," Van Atta said.

An overpowering value to both cult members and terrorists is the belief that the outside world is the

Origins may be difficult to trace

Peering into the past can be like looking into a kaleidoscope of sexual identities, and people must look at the evidence instead of immediately taking a 20th-century viewpoint.

Bob Clark, assistant professor of French, described the problems gays, lesbian and bisexuals face when they try to research their origins.

"It is hard for gays and lesbians to try to rediscover their own past history because it has been silenced," Clark said. "It's like you're making up a story and you wonder if it's the truth."

Gays, lesbians and bisexuals might feel incomplete because it is hard to decipher what scholars were trying to tell us, Clark said.

POWERFUL EARTHQUAKE STRIKES MEXICAN COASTLINE, KILLS 30

MANZANILLO, Mexico (AP) — Bernadette McCafferty ran screaming through the hall in her pajamas when the Radisson Hotel began to sway in a powerful earthquake.

"It felt like being in a boat with high waves," said the Canadian tourist from Oakville, Ontario. "I felt like I was done. Dead."

The 7.6-magnitude quake struck Mexico's Pacific Coast on Monday morning, killing at least 30 people and injuring 90 as it toppled houses and hotels, cracked bridges, split highways and cut power and phone services.

In Manzanillo, a popular resort 330 miles west of Mexico City, the seven-story Costa Real Hotel was reduced to rubble. Rescuers pulled 12 bodies and 10 injured people from the ruins but suspended their search at dusk because there was no power — hence no light.

Red Cross workers and sailors from the nearby port built a temporary morgue on the lawn next to the hotel pool, laying sheet-covered corpses side by side.

SUPREME COURT CONSIDERS REINSTATEMENT OF GAY-RIGHTS BAN

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court, in its most important gay-rights case in nearly a decade, is considering whether states can forbid laws intended to protect homosexuals against bias in such matters as housing and employment.

Colorado is asking the justices to reinstate a 1992 state constitutional amendment that banned all laws and ordinances that protect gays from discrimination. The state said voters have the right to prevent homosexuals from being given preferred legal status.

But the Colorado Supreme Court threw out the amendment, saying it denied gays an equal voice in government.

The case being argued does not address the morality or legality of homosexuality or gay conduct. But the justices' ruling, expected by July, might indicate their views on the continuing validity of the high court's 1986 ruling that consenting adults have no constitutional right to private homosexual conduct.

LABORATORY TESTS MIGHT LEAD RESEARCHERS TO DIABETES CURE

WASHINGTON (AP) — Insulin-producing tissue was transplanted between unrelated mice by teaching the immune system to accept foreign tissue in what researchers said could be a step toward curing diabetes.

In a study published today in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, scientists at the University of Massachusetts Medical Center in Worcester, Mass., said they demonstrated in mice a technique of transplanting insulin-producing pancreatic islets without the use of anti-rejection drugs.

Dr. Aldo A. Rossini, senior author in the study, said the transplant technique involves shots of white blood cells made from the mice and injections of a substance called anti-CD40L.

Together, these shots train the immune system of the receiving mouse to tolerate the transplanted pancreatic islets.

CLARIFICATION

► Double 10 is a celebration of Taiwan's Anniversary of Revolution of 1911. But the celebration does not denote Taiwan as an independent country. Taiwan is recognized as a part of the People's Republic of China. The population is 84-percent Taiwanese, 14-percent mainland Chinese and 2-percent aborigine.

The United States does not acknowledge Taiwan as separate country, but it does track Taiwan's gross national product, inflation rate, unemployment rate and budget separately from China.

CORRECTIONS

► The word "independence" was mistakenly used in a graphic concerning the Taiwanese holiday, Double 10.

► Because of a production error, the last sentence of the "Woman raped off campus" story was cut off. The last sentence, a quote from Sigma Chi president Justin Boisseau, should have read as follows:

"The Sigma Chis haven't had any problems with theft or safety in the past," Boisseau said. The Collegian regrets the errors.

► SELF-DEFENSE

Classes may decrease rape risk

■ Education increases awareness among women

Cori Cornelson
staff reporter

People might not be able to prevent rape, but there are some things they can do to decrease the chances of it happening, Judy Davis, director of Women's Resource Center, said.

"In order to be able to successfully resist an assault, one must contemplate being assaulted," Davis said.

Self-defense classes are one way to practice resistance of an assault and can reduce the risk of becoming a rape victim, she said.

They can help create or improve a woman's self-awareness, Davis said. The Women's Resource Center offers free self-defense workshops to K-State students. Other businesses in Manhattan also offer self-defense classes.

Another way to reduce the risk of being assaulted is to avoid alcohol, Davis said.

Alcohol is a risk factor of rape that people can control, she said.

Davis said she thought if alcohol were taken out of the world, it wouldn't stop rape, but it would help.

The Women's Resource Center tries to help women by teaching them in workshops how they can be safer, she said.

"We encourage women to take steps so that they can be safe and free," Davis said.

She said she doesn't want to be in the business of telling women to walk alone, but she said if they do decide to walk alone, they should do it in an area they know is safe.

"I don't think we're going to see an end to these crimes until there's serious consequences to those who commit them," Davis said.

If a rape does occur, Davis said it is important for the victim to get emotional support and medical treatment. She said there is confidential, free assistance available in the community for rape victims.

The Crisis Center Inc., a community-based program for battered women and rape victims, is one place where victims can go for help.

Deb Schroeder, client services coordinator for the center, said the center has sexual assault survivor and abuse survivor groups that meet regularly.

VICTIM OF RAPE?

- Steps to take if you or someone you know has been raped. 1. preserve physical evidence. Don't bathe, shower or douche. 2. Get medical attention, both physical and emotional. 3. Contact authorities.

Source: Women's Resource Center

The center also provides individual therapy sessions.

She said there is often a misconception that rape occurs in dark alleys. Seventy-five percent of rape victims know their assailant, Schroeder said.

She said it is smart for people to know their limits of a relationship and set firm limits, and if there are any uncomfortable feelings, they should be acted upon.

People always have the right to say no, Schroeder said.

She said prevention starts by not walking alone, telling someone where you are going and by parking vehicles in a well-lit area.

► SECURITY

Safety concerns greek students

■ Recent rape prompts security review in houses

Sara Edwards
staff writer

How secure are greek houses?

Depending on the house, the doors might not be locked at all.

"Individual security is up to chapters. All the chapters have the necessary devices to make the chapter secure. For the most part, they're not used unless students are away," Jarrod Fish, Intra-Fraternity Council president, said.

Tyler Houdek, the risk-management officer for Sigma Alpha Epsilon, said his fraternity usually relies on members around the house to watch people coming in.

They also have a person on phone and door duty on week-nights.

"The only real problem is when you know there are guys around who you don't know who they are," Houdek said.

Brad Parker, recruitment chair of Farmhouse, said its business manager usually locks the doors at 1 a.m. every night.

Before that, it relied on members in the downstairs area to watch the house.

"The only real problem we have is Friday and Saturday night when the guys go out," Parker said.

Tige Soderberg, Phi Gamma Delta corresponding secretary, said the fraternity had some break-ins last year. It had an owl and items out of its trophy case stolen.

"We changed all our doors last summer. The main door has a code and the doors lock behind a person when they leave," Soderberg said.

Most sororities lock their doors at all times. The sorority gives members a key or combination to get in.

The Delta Delta Delta house has its doors locked 24 hours. Instead of combination locks, all the members have keys.

They also have a phone and door member on duty from 8 a.m. to midnight, Faye Premer, social chair, said.

The Kappa Alpha Theta house uses combination locks. All the members know the combination.

However, sometimes the combination is found out by outsiders, and the sorority has to change it, Lori Simpson, house manager, said.

Simpson said a man pried open a window in the basement earlier this year around 5:30 a.m.

They called the police when they caught him attempting to steal the house composite.

Although greek houses have experienced some theft, it is mainly just composite stealing.

Sororities have been encouraged to call the police and press charges when this happens.

Houdek said something would probably be said in the chapter meeting about Sunday's rape.

They would encourage members to watch out for people coming in the house.

K-State goes on-line with new home page; academic links still under construction

Scott Allen Miller
contributing writer

K-State's new home page is up and running.

The new home page replaces the old, unofficial home page that was created by Computing and Network Services. This new home page was created under the auspices of the Webmaster Committee.

At the top of the home page is an image map with virtual buttons that can be clicked on and used as links to other Web pages.

Also in this image map is the name of the University, a graphic of Anderson Hall and the official seal of the University.

A text-based menu is made available further down the Web pages for faster downloading.

At the bottom of the home page and all of the Web pages that are linked to it is another image map that can be clicked on to return to the home page, to conduct a search on K-State Unicorn information system, to find the latest additions to Unicorn, to get help and to leave comments to the coordinators of Unicorn. The search function is not yet available.

The virtual buttons, which have complementary text links below the image map, are labeled Welcome to K-State; News and Events; Campus Information; Consider K-State; Colleges and Departments; Information Technology; Athletics, Clubs and Organizations; Alumni and Foundation; Research and Graduate Studies; Virtual Campus; Library and References; and Beyond K-State.

The Welcome to K-State link brings up a Web page with four other links titled About K-State (a brief history and description of the University), K-State Campus Maps, K-State Directory, which replace the KSU White Pages, and K-State Office Directory.

The News and Events page has four links. These links include a calendar of events Web page, the E-Collegian, press releases from News Services and a link to weather information.

Campus Information is another link to the map of K-State.

Consider K-State will eventually have information for prospective students, the Web page said.

Colleges and Departments has four links. The Academic Colleges link does not work yet. There is a link explaining official University committees, another link for other campus entities, and another link to the department and office directory.

The information Technology page has links to the CNS and Telecommunications home pages.

Athletics, Clubs and Organizations leads to the football team's link.

Alumni and Foundation brings up a Web page with a link to the home page of the Alumni Association.

The Research and Graduate Studies page has one link called Graduate School.

Virtual Campus is a link to a Web page with two more links called Division of Continuing Education and Extension Systems and Agricultural Research Programs.

in our opinion

Volleyball, other sports deserve support of fans

But don't stop at tonight's volleyball match. Continue to support the smaller varsity sports — your support is needed more there than anywhere else.

The Nebraska Cornhuskers are coming to town tonight, and the K-State volleyball team needs your support.

The 13-4 Wildcats are off to their best start in 17 years, and Coach Jim Moore and the players could use a large crowd.

The 14-1 top-ranked Cornhuskers are riding a 13-match winning streak and a 50-match winning streak against the Cats.

So it might not be Matt Miller and the football team, or Elliot Hatcher and the basketball team, but there is much more to K-State athletics than just the two most-publicized men's sports. And they deserve your support as well.

While the football and basketball squads take the headlines, other squads quietly get the jobs done. It's not just volleyball; it's tennis, golf, cross country, baseball and many others.

So give these teams their due respect and cheer on the purple and white.

The volleyball team takes the court at 7:30 p.m. at Ahearn Field House. Admission is free.

So show up and scream like there is no tomorrow. Bang your feet, and make some noise. Bring your friends, family and colleagues.

But don't stop at tonight's volleyball match. Continue to support the smaller varsity sports — your support is needed more there than anywhere else.

Tonight, the focus is volleyball, and it's not every night a nationally ranked sports team makes its way to Manhattan, and it's not every time K-State stands a chance of winning.

The Cats are 0-50 lifetime against the Cornhuskers, and tonight could be the night the streak comes to an end.

And you could say you were there.

BI/LES/GAY COMING OUT

Editor,

By now, almost everyone knows the National Coming Out Day drill. It's the day when lesbian, bisexual and gay people across America stand up and say, "Yes, we're still here, and we're still queer. And we're still not going anywhere."

It's one day each year we dedicate to the proposition that les/bi/gay people do exist; that we do deserve the rights and privileges of straight people, and that we also are a valuable part of this society.

Coming Out Day is traditionally a time to share our individual histories, to take pride in our work, to end hatred and to celebrate our continued survival in a culture that would rather we kept quiet — or, better yet, disappear altogether.

It's a time to recount our successes, to rejoice in our relationships with relatives and friends, which have been deepened by our increasing honesty about our lives. But today is a day we should also remember those lesbians, bisexuals and gays who aren't with us.

Today is a day to remember those who cannot celebrate with us because they haven't survived or because their survival is so much in doubt that they see no reason to celebrate.

They are the ones who are silent on this day when the rest of us are busy making noise, drawing attention to ourselves and the institutionalized injustice we suffer on this and every other day of the year.

We don't hear from the ones who are terrified to speak up and to come out because they risk losing their jobs, custody of their children, the support of their family and friends, their personal safety or even their lives.

We don't hear from the ones who have been beaten, raped, thrown in jails and mental institutions and murdered because they are "fags" or "dykes" and, therefore, not anything "normal" people need to worry about.

We don't hear from the ones who have killed themselves rather than live among people who hate them, who call them sick or depraved or hellbound. We don't hear from the ones who gave up before they even reached adulthood, who saw no way to survive, the 33 percent of all teen suicides in America who "happen" to be lesbian, bisexual, or gay.

We don't hear from those who have chosen subtler or slower ways to destroy themselves — the ones who numb themselves with alcohol or drugs, or go crazy with the knowledge there is still no place for them in this heterosexual society.

For every name signed to this letter and other letters like it on this day of celebration, there are thousands of names will never appear.

There are millions of people in America who haven't survived or won't survive — our brothers and sisters, our sons and daughters, our friends and lovers.

Each one of them is missed, not just by other les/bi/gay people, but by their straight relatives and friends. Each one is a loss we cannot afford to tolerate — an unnecessary loss we, straight and queer alike, must do everything possible to prevent, even if that means putting ourselves at risk.

When every gay, lesbian and bisexual person in America can break his or her silence and join us in coming out on this day, when there is no longer any need to come out because homosexual bonds have become as cherished in our society as heterosexual bonds, and when people no longer need to be afraid to show their love in all its varied and beautiful forms, then we will truly have a reason to celebrate.

WHY CELEBRATE?

Editor,

I am writing about the week-long celebration of gay/lesbian/bisexual activities going on in the K-State Student Union this week.

It makes me sick to see people so supportive and open to the gay community.

There are gays and lesbians popping up on every talk show and in other TV shows on a daily basis.

Some polls indicate that 2 or maybe 3 percent of people in the United States are gay, lesbian or bisexual. So why are we celebrating this?

We don't celebrate a heterosexual week.

I think what's happening is people are so busy trying to be politically correct that they forget about morals and standards.

Don't get me wrong — I'm not a nazi, but I would like to go into the Union without having a bunch of homosexuals celebrating their lifestyle in front of me. Keep it behind closed doors, please.

Domestic violence, abuse can't be ignored

In America, we love our privacy. Although there isn't an actual constitutional amendment saying we have absolute privacy, it is implied within the Bill of Rights that we're pretty much allowed to live a free and good life filled with choices.

This transcends into actual contemporary American life as somewhat untrue, because of various cycles existing within not only our system of government, but within the unspoken rules of our society.

Because of our fierce love of freedom and privacy, we stand behind locked doors and closed curtains. Even if we don't close those doors, those who witness transgressions close those doors because it isn't their business.

Privacy is both a blessing and a curse, depending on the individuals in question.

There can be no doubt that certain victims within the system remain silent because no one wants to listen.

From the start of time, violence, as well as degradation toward women, has been a silent shadow cast over life, rarely having any light shone upon it. When light is shone upon unspoken crimes, society is eager to throw a tarp over that light and go on about the day's business.

And so we have millions of single women raising their children under difficult circumstances; no truly accurate TV shows are made about what they undergo.

Every year, women are killed or beaten by their lovers, both spurned and beloved. This is a problem that stretches beyond any race or monetary status, because there is no group unaffected by this.

Despite what anyone can say about the Simpson trial, one immutable fact remains: He beat his wife and caused her to live in fear.

There were incidents where she ran from her house in her bra. There were several 911 calls in which she was frantic and crying. At one point, when Simpson was almost arrested, he walked into his house to change clothes and then drove off in his car.

He was never pursued. The institutions of law and justice should never turn from the oppressed, yet it was and is repeatedly done so in several instances of domestic abuse.

I'm not going to venture an opinion about Simpson's guilt or innocence.

He was judged not guilty by a jury of his peers on two counts of murder, and that issue is over and done with in a court of justice, forever.

However, wherever he rides, in whatever vehicle, he will never escape the fact that he bullied his wife.

I know the public is sick of Simpson. Through the stubbornness of lawyers and ineptitude of a judge, everyone lost interest in a boring trial that was supposedly the trial of the century.

But the issue of domestic violence is one that we cannot be tired of because, in all actuality, we have never addressed it. To address it would be to look at all the injustices of past eras, and that's ignoring the fact that we have trouble examining societal dilemmas that occur in this day and age. It is unfortunate that Simpson will never be tried for beating his wife, Nicole Brown is dead, and in time, memory of the effects of his abuse toward her will be forgotten.

Photos of her wearing large sunglasses that conceal a bruise, or images of her running from her house in a bra and sweatpants, will only be seen in large issues of news magazines that document both this decade and this century when they are over.

Simpson, like any abusive husband, should not be given total custody of his children. He was abusive toward his wife, so there is always a chance he will be abusive toward them.

The family of Nicole Brown should petition the courts for custody of the children; at the most, Simpson should be granted visits supervised by a neutral party.

One could argue that so much has been taken from him, his children should not follow suit. However, their safety is much more important than the wishes of an abusive man.

Men like Simpson live on every block in America. They are most likely loved by most of their family and friends. Asking people to report incidents of abuse, as well as helping women to SOS shelters, is unreal.

Old habits die hard, and people will continue to ignore all the signs of abuse, both within their own lives and that of their acquaintances.

However, if you remember one thing, remember this: The Juice is loose, and so are all the men who cause their wives, girlfriends and children to live in terror of the next outburst.

Enjoy, protect your privacy

The place — Kedzie Hall, Monday afternoon.

Kevin, my editor: "So, hon, what are you planning on writing about this week?" (He actually called me "hon.")

Me: "I'm keeping it a surprise."
Kevin: "Don't have a clue, huh?"

Me: "Not a one."
Kevin: "Why don't you just spill your guts, bare your soul?"

No, no, a thousand times no. Forget it, don't ever mention it again. All of my secrets are guarded with my life and firearms, and I'm not telling you so just drop it. The only thing that can get me to talk is tequila and probably more of it than you've got.

My No. 1 reason for not telling is that it won't benefit anyone, least of all me. (The papers are free, so I don't think we'll sell more.)

Is it just me, or has privacy become something of a rarity in this day and age? Lately, people have been telling me things right out of the blue — things I don't need to know. Is it because I'm a columnist, or do I just look trusting?

If you have a scorpion tattoo, don't show it to me in the elevator, especially if it means moving any clothing other than a sleeve.

If you lost your virginity to your little sister's babysitter when you were 12, believe me — there's nothing I can do about that.

I have skeletons in my closet, too. I think we all do; it's part of being alive. But one of the joys of having secrets is sharing them with the right person at the right time. I think discretion is important in these matters.

The more journalism I study, the more the privacy issue and the people's right to know is addressed. These two issues have been in conflict with each other for years.

How important is it for the public to know that the mayor is cheating on his wife — does it affect his job? Obviously, if someone in power is using illegal drugs, that should be brought up and stopped, but what if they're a cross-dresser? How deep should we dig?

This is the information age, and no one will deny it. Things travel fast and far. I can sit in my study and pick a fight with people in France (I don't, but knowing I can is sort of fun). So what do you say to someone you'll probably never meet? Talking about the weather seems sort of pointless; you might as well get personal.

Sharing problems on the computer can be helpful; at least you get another point of view.

I wonder how the definition of intimacy will change in the future. Will people meet, make friends and grow old together without ever meeting face to face?

I've been thankful lately that I can lock my doors, pull my shades and pretend I'm not home. There are days when I am eternally grateful the Collegian doesn't print my address. I probably hide under my rock more than I should, but what the heck?

Let's return to the days of secrets, to keeping things between friends and within the family.

Not completely though — some things should be, and need to be, shared. But let's be tactful and keep our mouths shut about certain matters. Privacy is a great thing; we have amendments to protect it. Enjoy it and use it wisely.

Fall Fashion Essentials

This season's clothes go retro and get tighter

text by Trina Holmes

Women's Styles

You saw it in the 1960s and 1970s. Now, it's back. The fashions for today's women are recycling the styles that were popular in previous decades, Kate Cashman, manager of Krystallos in Aggieville, said.

She said Krystallos specializes in comfortable clothes that don't require special handling.

"The big issues for most women is that they want to look good but need to be comfortable," she said. "Comfort is a big issue in our clothes, as well as easy care. If clothes have to be dry cleaned, that gets expensive."

Emily Heinrich, sophomore in arts and sciences, said she typically chooses clothes based on comfort.

"I like some of the latest trends, but I go more for comfort," she said. "I like to wear big, baggy shirts and sweat-shirts."

Another trend Cashman noted is a move toward closer fitting and tighter clothes.

"A lot of people are more body conscious," she said. "Short skirts are popular. In skirts, the hems are either above the knee or at the ankle."

Cashman said cardigans are going to be very popular this season.

"With a cardigan, you'll be able to dress it up as much as a blazer — it's the new blazer for this year," Gay Wince, manager at Limited in Manhattan Town Center said.

"This will help upcoming graduates because it will make an easy transition from business to casual attire."

"A lot of corporations are going to casual Fridays so people want to get more from their suit."

Primary colors are popular for activewear, Wince said, and browns and grays are more trendy for business suits.

"With business suits, you'll see a mixing of pastels with a darker color," she said. "You'll see a pink mock rather than a white shirt under a jacket."

Another big item is the sweater jacket or coat, Wince said.

Darah Eichem, district sales manager for the Buckle for Guys & Gals and manager of the Buckle at Manhattan Town Center, said customers can expect to find a lot of wool blends and different textures in fall fabrics.

"There's a lot of great surface interest in different fabrics, a lot of different feels," she said. "You know how you put on a sweatshirt and say 'This feels so soft'? Well, in your tops and in your jeans, it's the fabric that sells the product."

Eichem said the clothes the Buckle carries have usually been altered from their mass-distributed form to give them more individuality to the store's image.

"On 80 percent of the merchandise we carry, something has been changed about the product to make it unique to the store," she said.

She said jeans with exaggerated legs are stylish, and the store carries some hard-to-find brands that are popular with college students.

"Lucky, CK, and Mossimo are destination-type brands," she said. "You can't just go anywhere and find them. It takes the hype off a product when you know everybody has it."

"What individuality a person has comes through in the way they dress," Cashman said.

Shoes and Accesories

Belts, sterling silver necklaces and grung-style shoes are the way to accessorize your outfits this fall.

Clyde Cott, co-owner and manager of Brown's Shoe Fit Co., said the college crowd has gravitated toward a clunky style of footwear.

"The heavier-soled, lug-soled, clunky-looking stuff is really popular," he said. "In both genders, the outdoor, heavy look is in."

This look also extends to dress shoes, he said, with colors in basic earth such as tones, blacks, blues and naturals.

"Even some dress shoes are thicker-soled," Cott said. "You'll see it in tennis and strap shoes. It's catching on with everybody."

Julie Neill, senior in family studies and human services, said she likes clunky shoes up to a point but doesn't want to take it too far.

"I go for the tamer type," Neill said.

"I don't dig tennis shoes with a three-inch heel. I don't like them that clunky. I think mules with a big heel are cute, though. I guess from flat-soled shoes to a major clunk, I'm somewhere in between."

In men's clothes, Cliff Johnson, salesperson for Burke's Shoes at Manhattan Town Center, said the casual look is also in for men's foot wear.

"The trend is toward casual buck shoes," he said. "They're not going for smooth, dressy shoes."

As far as socks go, Johnson said the trend is moving toward warmer fabrics.

"Big, wool socks are really popular in greens, blues, multi-colors and combination colors," he said.

Necklaces are still popular, Kate Cashman, manager of Krystallos, said.

"Chokers, silver cuffs around the neck that you can put pendants on are very big," she said. "Sterling silver is still very big, which is lucky for everybody shopping because it's a great buy."

"Flowers and the celestial theme are also still very big."

In belts, Russ Bunker, manager of Lowman's Men's Store, said the trend is moving toward a lot of hardware.

"You'll see big buckles, brass, antique-looking, pewter-looking buckles," he said. "Some will have tips on the end, and they'll be a little wider than they were two to three years ago."

Another trend is in cufflinks, Bunker said.

"You don't see this in the Midwest, but the trend is toward more cufflinks and shirts with French cuffs," he said. "In larger cities, you'll see it, but you won't see it in the Midwest. It's not that Midwesterners don't understand, but we're obviously a little more conservative."

Men's Styles

Casual comfort is the name of the game for men's fashion this fall. Sportswear, rugby shirts and fleecewear are gaining popularity, Russ Bunker, manager of Lowman's Men's Store in Aggieville, said.

Henleys are also trendy, he said. "Henleys are two- or three-button, collarless shirts that are just a little more casual," Bunker said. "You'll see them with a bunch of different lines and weights — knit, rugby, heavy knitwear, sweatshirts. They're really big."

For suits, Bunker said natural fabrics like wool are popular.

"Polyester is still a no-no," he said. "You'll see some twisted yarns that give things a European look. It almost gives it a double knit look — lightening the fabric, not in color but in weight. Then they don't wrinkle."

Loose-fit cotton twill pants and denim are still stylish, Bunker said. "Now, there's triple and quadruple pleats and box pleats, rather than strictly double pleats," he said.

In the dresswear line, Bunker said banded collar shirts, which are collarless dress shirts, are popular.

"Button-down collared shirts are almost nonexistent," he said. "You'll see more long-point, spread-collar, or tab-collared shirts."

"I can't remember the last button-down dress shirt we've sold. And five years ago, all we sold were button down shirts."

At the Buckle for Guys & Gals, Darah Eichem, district sales manager for the company and manager of the store in Manhattan Town Center, said males can find new washes in Lucky jeans wear. They also have updated the garment dyes with new screens.

Eichem said forest green, camel, plum, tobacco, slate blue, red, black, charcoal and white are popular colors this season.

Jeans with wider bottoms are also trendy, she said.

"Companies continue to test wider bottoms on jeans," she said. "Two, new test labels we carry are Generation X and Silver."

"Now, a lot of vendors are into the retro looks and specialty make-ups for shirts," Eichem said.

Mike Pemberton, freshman in mechanical engineering, said he hasn't bought clothes since he graduated from high school.

"I hate the prep look except when I'm going out," he said. "If you're going to class, you should be comfortable."

"I think of it like when you were in grade school and you were going to take a test, so they told you to bring crackers and juice because you might get hungry or thirsty. I think in the same way, you should be comfortable so you can think about your class or concentrate on your homework. You don't want to get hot — like me, I can change if I get hot. I can take off my sweatshirt and just wear my T-shirt."

The only time Pemberton said he dresses up for class is if he is trying to make an impression on someone.

"If I'm trying to impress a girl, than I'll dress up nice for that class," he said.

Stress from heat no excuse for Marlowe

Charges have been dropped against K-State starting safety Chuck Marlowe involving an incident in which he was alleged to have assaulted a police officer.

Why?

"At the time of the incident, Marlowe was suffering from delirium and from heat exhaustion," assistant Riley County attorney Michael Kearns said.

All this was brought on, Kearns said, from the training Marlowe went through that day at football practice.

Well, isn't that convenient?

Charges against a football player are dropped because of the intense workout encountered in summer two-a-days. And we thought football players had it easy.

Marlowe — an innocent man under the unyielding affects of the sun. Then who is to blame? Maybe, somehow, the blame should be shifted to Coach Bill Snyder. After all, he is the one inflicting this cruel and unusual punishment on his team. Players should stand up to Snyder and show him the wrong in his ways of two-a-days. Maybe he's the one to stand trial. But he won't.

Somehow an escape has been found without a scapegoat — I'm thinking maybe I can use this to my advantage.

Come to think of it, my grades are slipping a bit.

So, Dan Shea, my fundamentals of acting scene is not going that well? You have to understand something, Dan, it's hot, damn hot. And Nichols Hall isn't that close to my house, either, and with the long walk, the hot mid-day sun and all...

So, Charles Lubbers, my fundamentals of public relations grade could use a little improvement? Well, there are just too many people in the class, and with all the body heat generated, and whatnot, it is downright hot. My mind was not functioning properly, and even though I knew the answers, I was unable to write what I knew was correct.

I might have missed a few deadlines at the Collegian, but N. Stewart Anderson and Mike Marlett, you have to understand. It's a little toasty in the newsroom at times, and my mind starts wandering, and I just can't concentrate.

And to any girl to whom I may have said something I would regret: It's not my fault. It's been extremely hot and humid during the last few weeks, and that heat can make you say and think things you will later regret. I am not to blame.

So, Chuck Marlowe, I thank you. You have helped me in my time of need.

But I will not use the heat cop-out. I face the problems I create for myself. A man of solid stature can face up to the facts.

Truth, ethics and morality are three important virtues. Notice that college football is not included. Don't let the pressure of starting on a nationally ranked college football team get to you; don't sacrifice your principles.

Winning is important, and the team needs you Chuck Marlowe, I know.

I would love to be covering the No. 1 college football team in the country, but shortcuts don't help, they only hurt.

Some things are more important than football, television and bowl games.

I know this.

I hope Chuck Marlowe does.

And, I imagine, so does the assaulted officer.

Respond to Todd via e-mail at (toddvs@ksu.ksu.edu).

Volleyball to face No. 1 Nebraska

Cats after first win in school history against NU

Shana Newell
staff writer

No. 1-ranked Nebraska has arrived at K-State.

No, it has not come for football. Wildcat fans must wait a few weeks for that match-up.

But anyone interested in a K-State-Nebraska battle can find it at Ahearn Field House as the K-State volleyball team takes on the squad from Lincoln.

Nebraska, 14-1 on the season and 4-0 in the Big 8, has been ranked as the top team in the nation for the fifth-consecutive week.

It has a 13-match winning streak going in 1995 and a 50-match winning streak against K-State.

The Cats are 13-4 as they have recorded one of their best starts ever but have dropped their last two matches, resulting in a 1-2 record in the Big 8.

Following a Cat upset against then-16th-ranked Colorado, the Cats fell to Iowa State and Oklahoma.

The K-State volleyball team has never defeated Nebraska in 50 meetings.

It joins Kansas and Iowa State as the only Big 8 teams to not accomplish that feat.

But as intimidating as the Huskers are to the Cats, Coach Jim Moore said he is concerned with how K-State performs against itself, not the Nebraska Cornhuskers.

"We just need to worry about us and do the things we're capable of doing, regardless of the outcome," Moore said.

Are they able to defeat the nation's powerhouse?

Moore said he doesn't know. "We're just going to wing it," he said.

On the season, the team is hitting a solid .274 but has dropped to .221 against conference opponents.

Junior middle blocker Kate DeClerk has hit .405 against K-State opponents, leading the Big 8. She has 194 kills and 83 block assists, both team highs, and has recorded 155 digs this year.

Also contributing to the success of the Cats is sophomore setter Devon Rynning.

Rynning leads the team with 27 service aces and 793 set assists. She owns the school record in set assists.

Moore will also utilize junior play-set-hitter Yolanda "Toie" Young against the Huskers.

Against Big 8 teams, Young leads the Cats in kills with 52, hitting .220.

She also has four service aces and 34 digs in the three matches.

K-State takes the court against the Huskers at 7:30 tonight at Ahearn.

The Cats are just going to try everything, Moore said, in order to compete solidly against Nebraska.

"If anybody knows exactly how to do it, then they are more than welcome to have my job," he said.

"We just need to worry about us and do the things we're capable of doing, regardless of the outcome."

K-STATE VOLLEYBALL COACH

Senior hitter Jill Dugan returns a volley against Valparaiso earlier this season. Dugan and the Cats won 3-1. The squad faces No. 1 Nebraska tonight at Ahearn Field House.

OSU back worries Snyder

Co-coordinators work well for K-State defense

Ryan O'Halloran
staff writer

Last winter, K-State coach Bill Snyder asked his colleagues around the country what they thought about his idea to have co-coordinators to run the defense.

They told Snyder having co-coordinators would create disaster both on the field and in the locker room. Snyder didn't listen.

Instead of having one defensive coordinator, Snyder promoted Bobby Stoops and Jim Leavitt to co-defensive coordinators before the season.

Entering Saturday's game against Oklahoma State, the Wildcat defense is first in the nation in scoring defense and total defense, and third in passing defense.

The squad's three consecutive shutouts make it the first team in Division I to accomplish that since Boston College did it in 1992, and the first Big 8 team to do it since Nebraska turned the hat trick in 1979.

"They're playing well," Snyder said at Tuesday's press conference. "I think we're about where we'd like to be. There are still some unanswered questions, but I thought Saturday's ballgame was indicative of how far we've come defensively and how well we're playing."

The task this week is to stop the Cowboys (1-4, 0-1). For the third-straight Tuesday, Snyder said the OSU game will be the defense's biggest test of the year.

"I think this will be, and I know you'll question me saying this because I said it last week and the week before," Snyder said. "But I think this indeed is to this point, maybe, the stiffest test against the running game."

Junior tailback David Thompson has rushed for 598 yards this season, good for second in the conference behind Iowa State's Troy Davis, who has already eclipsed the 1,000-yard mark.

Defensive tackle Dirk Ochs has been key in stopping the run so far this season, and that will need to continue on Saturday. Through five games, the senior has 23 tackles and seven quarterback sacks.

"He is just playing really, really well," Snyder said. "We get that perception of Dirk, and I've been guilty of saying it, of him being a steady ballplayer. He doesn't make mistakes. You don't notice him very much because he's playing the way it should be done. But what has happened is that Dirk has done all of those things, and now, all of a sudden, he's becoming more visible."

The K-State defense, which has not given up a touchdown in more than a month, has helped propel the Cats to their first-ever Associated Press Top 10 this week. K-State is ranked eighth in the AP poll and USA Today-Coaches Poll.

Snyder gives much of the defense credit to Stoops and Leavitt.

"The problems that sometimes have been created in other programs have been that of ego and sharing responsibilities,"

Snyder said. "That was basically the reason I was provided by other coaches across the country that have gone in that direction. They said it might not be the best thing to do."

"But after listening to some of those comments, it was my feeling that both of them are top people, and neither one of them has a problem in that direction. Ego is not at all a problem. Both of them are special and have a great relationship with each other."

During the week, Stoops designs the game plan, and Leavitt coordinates the game plan. Snyder will stop the pass, and how K-State will stop the attack to the snuff the run. So instead of one coordinator doing the time-consuming job alone, Stoops and Leavitt have the game plan in place in half the time.

"The up side of it is that you get a perspective from two standpoints, which I think is invaluable," Snyder said. "It allows you to double your productivity so one can direct all of his time toward the run and the other can direct all his time to the pass."

Chiefs fans find surprise on trip home from 29-23 win over San Diego Chargers

Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Police wanted to make a point about drinking and driving — and thousands of Kansas City Chiefs fans caught in a massive post-game traffic jam got the message.

Motorists had their own message Tuesday about the sobriety checkpoint run by police and the Missouri State Highway Patrol on westbound Interstate 435 near Arrowhead Stadium — it was not a good idea.

"We've had two (phone calls) saying 'good job,' and several complaining," Kansas City Police Officer Roger Brown said Tuesday afternoon.

How many were complaining? "I've lost count," Brown said.

Some callers cursed, and others left their names and phone numbers and received a call back from Capt. Gary Majors or a sergeant explaining the checkpoint.

"We certainly apologize for any inconvenience we've caused anybody," Majors said. "Our intent was not to delay their travel home but was twofold — to take off the road any people who had too much to drink and prevent anybody getting hurt and to get our message out about the dangers of drinking and driving."

Within only seven miles of leaving the stadium, following Monday night's 29-23 overtime Chiefs' victory, thousands of fans ran into a sea of brake lights on I-435, the main conduit from the stadium to the Kansas-side suburbs.

With the game ending at 11:42 p.m., the delay was not welcome. Motorists reported spending an hour to 90 minutes in the traffic jam, with some people not arriving home until 2:30 a.m. Officers stopped 4,680 vehicles, arrested 21 people on drunken-driving charges and arrested two on drug possession charges. Fans fumed about the checkpoint on a local sports-talk radio program.

"It was really an inconvenience. I'd like to know who the idiot was who thought of the idea to have the checkpoint there," said Chiefs season ticketholder Jeff Smith of Olathe, a Kansas City suburb.

"They (police) had a bus off the side of the road that they were using to board all the drunks. It was unbelievable," Smith told the Olathe Daily News.

Smith's group spent 75 minutes getting through the checkpoint.

"Everyone was stopped," Smith said. "We didn't get home until 2 a.m. I thought it was ridiculous to have a checkpoint set up after a game like that."

The checkpoint should have been set up closer to the stadium. The Chiefs' organization distanced itself from the checkpoint.

The checkpoint was prompted by two recent traffic deaths involving fans who had been drinking at Arrowhead or the adjacent Kauffman Stadium, where the Kansas City Royals baseball team plays.

The site on I-435 was chosen because the Chiefs' organization didn't want to check everybody leaving the stadium, he said.

About 40 officers were in place at 10:30 p.m., and orange cones were placed on the highway to funnel five lanes of traffic into two. The checkpoint came down about 2 a.m., and six hours later, the phones started ringing at the police department and at the Highway Patrol's Troop A in Lee's Summit.

Lt. W.E. Benitz of the patrol said he found drivers to be understanding once they were told the purpose of the checkpoint. Others cursed the troopers.

"But I'd much rather go out and do another DUI spot check than go to a home and tell a mother her 17-year-old son is not coming back and listen to those kinds of screams," Benitz said.

Game systems dominate market

■ Saturn, Playstation provide CD quality, sound

B.C. Camp II
staff reporter

One of the hottest home video games of 1983 allowed players to control a squarish blob of digitized gook that gobbled up ghosts and power pellets.

The last 12 years have been kind. In 1995, you can be a 9-foot knight that slices his opponent in half with a 6-foot sword, or be a 16-year-old girl with two steak knives from hell. The Sega Saturn ($399) and the Sony Playstation ($299) are the new kids on the block who are causing all the ruckus. The Saturn, which came out several months before the Playstation, wasn't the first 3-D-type video game on the market. Atari introduced its new game system, the Jaguar, last year but hasn't done as well as the newer game systems. "Systems like the Jaguar, 3DO, and the CDi have fallen to the side while the systems like the Playstation have taken off," Brian Harris, employee of Game Guy, said. "Atari has a reputation of abandoning its game systems, and Sega keeps coming out with little add-on extras that adds up in price. It looks to me like the Playstation is going to come out on top." The Playstation is leading the way in the new market, Sonya Perdue, Software Etc. employee, said. Sony has tested the Playstation in Japan since December and had less than a 50-percent return rate, which is excellent in the video game market. "The Playstation is by far the most popular system out right now," Perdue said. "Sony has pushed the Playstation real hard, and it has the games everyone is asking about," she said. "We've sold about twice as many Playstations as Sega Saturns." The new game systems are using CD quality to boost the power. The CD games can deliver stereo sound, 3-D graphics and over 16 million colors. Both the Saturn and the Playstation have scaling and rotation capabilities that change the perspective during the action to give you the best view of the action. But the most noticeable difference between the new game systems and the old ones is the graphics. "The graphics are unreal. It's almost lifelike," Perdue said. "All you have to do is compare the old Nintendo or Sega to the new systems, and you can easily see the difference." These new game systems even surpass PC game systems. The $2,500 system might be able to balance a checkbook and type papers, but the PC is outmatched when it comes to game-playing.

"The biggest advantage over computers is that the graphics are going to be better and the sound will be crisper," Harris said. "Your computer's main function isn't game-playing. It has other things to worry about. The only advantage is that your PC is dependable. It will always be there with games to play. They don't become obsolete as quickly." Harris said that before buying a game system, one should look at the company behind it. If the systems have been out for a while or if their manufacturer is a common name, it's going to be a safe buy. "Video-game buyers can get robbed because they buy the game, and then the company stops making games because it didn't sell as well as they thought," he said. Video-game makers are also aware of the problem with systems becoming obsolete. Many are trying to make it easier to upgrade as the systems become more complicated, Harris said. For now, students should do some comparison shopping and beware of playing games when they should be doing homework, Billy Williams, senior in graphic design, said. "We all go over to (a friend's house) and play the Playstation when we know we should be doing something else," he said. "But when you see the graphics, you forget what you had to do. It's great."

HEALTH CAREERS

Fair helps health-career students choose school

Jonathan Yeomans

Many students striving for a career in health professions must attend another school's professional program for their final degree. The College of Arts and Sciences and the Health Profession Advising Council are sponsoring the Health Professional School Fair to help students search for another school. The fair will be at the Union Ballroom from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. Thursday. "There will be representatives from 67 different school programs," Susan Gormely, health professions adviser, said. "This doesn't necessarily mean 67 different schools," she said. "For example, KU has a number of different programs it offers." Gormely said the fair is a recruiting tool for the schools, but it is mainly for the students who are interested in careers in health professions. "I'm looking forward to going to the fair," Guy Gross, junior in pre-medicine, said. "I'm not sure where I want to go for med school, and it should help me get a good idea of some of the schools' programs." The fair is not just for students who are ready to attend graduate school. "We're encouraging students as young as freshmen to get information they might need," Gormely said. "They need to get involved as early as possible." In the past, the health fair has proved helpful for students. "I went last year, and I got a better picture of what was available for me," Christy Perry, former student in pre-physical therapy, said. "I would encourage younger students to go and get an idea of what direction they need to take as an undergrad," she said. Anyone wanting more information about the fair can call Cathie Saal or Susan Gormely at the Health Profession Advising Office at 532-6900.

Power outage postpones cease-fire

Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovina — Bosnia's previous cease-fires have been shot full of holes on the battlefield. The latest, however, has been delayed on account of the capital's continuing battle with cold and darkness. A decision late Monday to postpone the truce followed a hectic day of shooting, shelling, NATO airstrikes and feverish work on utility lines. The cease-fire had been scheduled to take effect today at one minute after midnight. No new deadline was set. "It will not happen because the conditions have not been met yet," said Hasan Muratovic, the Bosnian government's minister in charge of relations with the United Nations. He said that although the government and the Bosnian Serbs tried their best to restore utilities, a key condition of the cease-fire accord brokered last week by the United States, the truce could not take effect until the work was done. Electricity was only partially restored, and there was still no natural gas. Muratovic blamed much of the gas problem on Russia, where supplies originate, for failing to order the valves opened on the pipeline running

FBI investigates train derailment

Associated Press

HYDER, Ariz. — FBI agents hunting the saboteur who derailed an Amtrak train worked Tuesday to determine whether the Sons of Gestapo is really an anti-government terrorist group or just someone with a grudge against the railroad.

The FBI expanded its painstaking search for evidence to a mile-square area surrounding the gulch where the Sunset Limited lurched off a damaged track, and it asked the public for help finding the culprit.

The train jumped the tracks at the damaged section early Monday, toppling 30 feet from a bridge, killing a crew member and injuring at least 78 people.

A letter found at the scene mentioned federal raids on right-wing extremists at Waco, Texas, and Ruby Ridge, Idaho. It was signed Sons of Gestapo, raising fears the sabotage was the work of anti-government extremists.

FBI officials had a brief news conference six miles from the scene Tuesday but offered little insight into the investigation called Operation Splinter and refused to comment about the letter.

With about 90 agents on the scene, Larry McCormick, acting special agent in charge of the Phoenix office, said he believed it was the bureau's second-biggest crime scene investigation after the Oklahoma City bombing.

"We are going to pursue every bit of evidence and every lead very thoroughly until we find the person or persons who committed this crime," U.S. Attorney Janet Napolitano said.

Acting on a tip, FBI agents found a derailing device on a set of railroad tracks in downtown Phoenix. Special Agent Al Davidson said the bureau knew nothing to connect the discovery with the derailment.

Derailling devices are not commonly used in railroad operation or maintenance, said Edward Emmett, president of the National Industrial Transportation League.

The case was put under the supervision of Assistant FBI Director Robert Bryant, who runs the bureau's national security division, according to a senior Justice Department official who spoke to the Associated Press in Washington on condition of anonymity. The division handles terrorism cases.

"Bryant's national security division has the case because it has the potential to become a terrorism case, but we have not reached any conclusions yet whether terrorism is the motive or not," the source said.

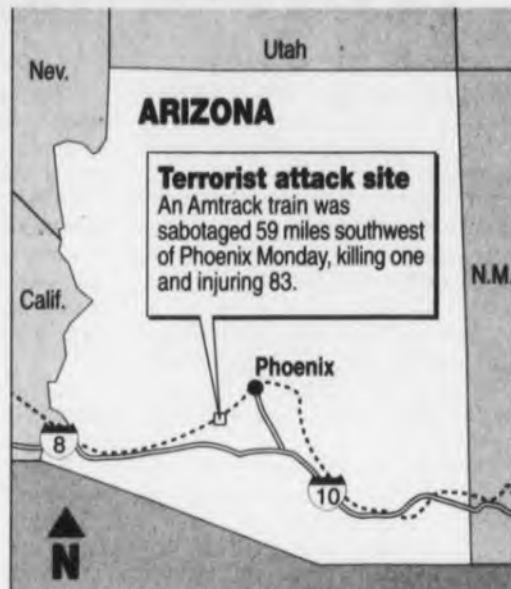

No group called Sons of Gestapo is known to experts at Klanwatch, which tracks hate groups for the Southern Poverty Law Center in Montgomery, Ala. An extensive search of news archives turned up no reference to the group.

Klaus Haase, a German historian specializing in the Gestapo, said he knows of no German or foreign groups using the name Gestapo.

A veteran federal investigator, speaking on condition of anonymity, told the AP in Washington that a disgruntled Amtrak employee or someone simply bent on mischief might have concocted a note to deflect attention.

"I don't know if this is a disgruntled employee of ours or another railroad, or someone else. Someone did know enough about the railroad to wire this," Amtrak President Thomas M. Downs said at a news conference Sunday.

Downs said the saboteurs removed a 3-foot, 18-pound steel bar that holds sections of rail together and bridged the gap with a wire to disable an electrical system that gives a red light to warn trains of breaks in the track.

Source: USA Today

Twenty-nine of the spikes that hold the rail to the wooden cross-ties on a 19-foot section of track had been removed, according to a source who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The train, carrying 248 passengers and 20 crew members from Miami to Los Angeles, derailed at about 1:20 a.m. Monday along an isolated stretch of track 55 miles southwest of Phoenix. Four cars were thrown into a gulch.

HALO presents Latino concert

B.C. Camp II
staff reporter

If you attended "Origins of Latino Music" on Tuesday evening, you got more than beautiful music — you got a history lesson.

Dr. Douglas Benson, professor of modern languages, serenaded a crowd of about 30 people in Union 205 with flamenco music and sweet lullabies.

"Flamenco music is from southern Spain and is sort of like jazz or blues here in the U.S.," Benson said.

"It's basically just improvising. There's a basic melody underneath, but the rest depends on you."

Before every song, Benson gave a bit of history to go along with the music. He discussed how Latino music is derived from different places, including Africa and Europe.

Nicole Lopez, sophomore in biomedical engineering, said she appreciated the historical information.

"It was nice," Lopez said. "I didn't know there were that many varieties of Latino music."

"Origins of Latino Music" was presented by HALO and is just one of the many events planned for Hispanic Heritage Month. At 6:30 tonight, HALO will present an art exhibit in McCain Auditorium. HALO's big event this month will be the Gran Baile at 9 Saturday night at Bombers in Aggieville. The cost is $3 with a student ID and $4 without. Carmen Sanchez, HALO president, said everyone is welcome.

"We had a good turnout tonight," Sanchez said. "It was good to see people who weren't associated with HALO or with the modern languages department. We hope to see even more people at the rest of the events."

KU students accidentally receive K-State scholarships

Associated Press

LAWRENCE — Todd Sponholtz, a freshman at the University of Kansas, was surprised to learn rival university K-State had awarded him a scholarship.

Sponholtz said Monday that he didn't apply to K-State.

"I haven't seen any of the money," Sponholtz said.

The same can be said for fellow KU freshmen Wade Cartwright and Anita Menning. All three students are Lawrence residents.

Cartwright and Menning were praised in a K-State news release as also having been awarded a K-State President's Scholarship, which pays $10,000 to $13,000 over four years.

Cheryl May, K-State director of news services, confirmed the list of K-State scholarship recipients released to the state's newspapers last month contained errors.

She wasn't sure how many of the 29 people from Lawrence reported to have received scholarships should have been deleted from the list.

"It's embarrassing," May said.

She said the list was issued without verifying the students' enrollment.

K-State ROTC earns state, national honors

Chad Moreland
staff reporter

K-State's ROTC program is stacking up honors and climbing national ranks.

"Our program was awarded best battalion in Kansas for the third-straight year and best battalion in the 4th Brigade for the second-consecutive year," Maj. George Stelljes, professor of military science, said.

Kansas ROTC units include K-State, University of Kansas and Pittsburg State University, and the 4th Brigade is comprised of 11 universities from Kansas, Arkansas and Oklahoma.

"It's a little like winning the Big 8 championship two years in a row," Stelljes said.

K-State's ROTC program was also nominated for the Founders and Patriots of America award, which goes to the best ROTC program in the region west of Mississippi.

Honors were based on the performance of 18 K-State ROTC cadets at summer training camp in Fort Lewis, Wash.

"The camp places cadets in leadership positions and evaluates them under various training conditions," Darrel Link, senior in management and ROTC cadet, said. "It gives us a chance to experience different situa-

The camp tests cadets on basic riflery marksmanship, an army physical fitness test and a land-navigation test. The cadets are also given a peer evaluation at the end of the training camp.

"Our battalion scored above the camp averages in every single category," Stelljes said.

"Forty-four percent of our cadets graduated, in the top 10 percent of all cadets attending the camp, and 67 percent graduated in the top 30 percent of all cadets," Stelljes said.

Nationally, K-State has eight graduating seniors who rank in the top 10 percent of graduating seniors. During the past four years, K-State has averaged 36 percent of its graduating seniors in the top 10 percent of the nation and 59 percent in the top 30 percent.

"We're extremely lucky to have such outstanding cadets," Stelljes said. "Our cadets, combined with our strong training program and facilities, give us a great advantage."

Keeping a high overall ranking is important to the cadets at K-State, Link said.

"There's always a drive to beat the previous year and a pressure to excel and do better," Link said.

Many of K-State's ROTC cadets have never known what it is like to not be nationally ranked, Link said.

"It means a lot to me," Link said. "I don't know if I could handle it any other way."

The cadets at K-State are also proud of the fact that they have beaten the cadets from the University of Kansas the last three years in an annual flag football game.

"It involves personal pride," Stelljes said. "The winning team gets to keep a traveling football as its trophy."

BOOK REVIEW

'Midnight' entertains, shines bright

Take a touch of voodoo magic, high society and a cast of colorful characters. Slowly add the murder of a hot-headed young male prostitute by a high-society antique dealer. Set it all in the Deep South. You now have the recipe for John Berendt's "Midnight in the Garden of Good and Evil."

Set in Savannah, Ga., "Midnight" maneuvers the reader through the murder of Danny Hansford, a 21-year-old rebellious borderline psychotic and known prostitute. Hansford is shot by Jim Williams, one of the members of Savannah's upper crust and a closeted homosexual who employed Hansford to work in his antique shop and do other "odd jobs."

Williams admits to killing Hansford, but there is a question as to whether it was in self-defense or cold blood. Berendt uses actual residents of Savannah, jumbled with a few fictitious characters, to show the readers the city's warmth and individuality.

Williams, the book's main character, is a collector of antiques and a man known throughout Georgia for throwing lavish Christmas parties and speaking his mind. At one point, an over-zealous film director was making a movie right outside Williams' historic home. Williams, irritated with the imposition, hung a Nazi flag out his window, hindering production.

Williams later explained he is not anti-Semitic but was irritated with the imposition of the film crew. The flag was just one of the many relics he collected from World War II.

One of the more outlandish characters is an African American drag queen named Chablis who is one of the real-life Savannah residents. Chablis, although not playing a main character, is perhaps the most memorable because of her (he prefers to be referred to as a woman) incredible candor.

One man, who is intrigued with her femininity and unsuspecting of her underlying masculinity, asked Chablis about the origins of her unusual name. She explained she didn't acquire the name until she was 16 years old.

"What was your name before that?" the man asked.

"Frank," she answered.

Another lovable character is Joe Odom. Odom is an in- and out-of-retirement tax attorney who is in debt higher than his hip boots. He is constantly coming up with get-rich-quick schemes that are destined for failure. But through it all, Joe keeps a cheerful outlook on life.

The book is peppered with descriptions of the Savannah's landscape. In most books, the descriptive paragraphs are something you can skip and not miss anything. "Midnight," however, makes the city's scenery seem so tempting and beautiful that you want to hop on the next plane there. Dispersed throughout the descriptions are historical FYIs.

Berendt shows the reader the beauty that won Savannah the title of one of the 10 most beautiful cities in the United States.

Another peripheral point Berendt makes is the still-existing class system thriving in the South.

Not only is there still obvious racial discrimination, but Berendt describes a caste system in which the rich are sometimes above of the law, and the poor are looked at in a condescending and patronizing way by high society.

ELECTRIC

tract with the U.S. Department of Energy since July 2, 1991. The contract will end on Jan. 31. Total funding to date is $1.56 million.

Hague said electric propulsion is the best method of taking a unit of energy and creating motion. Internal-combustion engines, found in most vehicles, are most efficient at creating heat, he said.

Electric cars not only differ by how they are powered, but in the sound they make — or don't make.

When stationary, an electric vehicle is eerily silent, Urbanek said.

"The car can be on, and you wouldn't even know it," he said. "The motor doesn't turn until you hit the acceleration pedal."

Even when moving, the electric car makes virtually no noise, he said.

The converted Escorts are heavier than the standard Escort.

"Because of the batteries and their tray, the electric Escort weighs more than 4,000 pounds," Urbanek said. "The batteries and tray alone weigh about 1,000 pounds."

Jeff Chapman, sales consultant at Dick Edwards Auto Plaza, said the curb weight of the comparable gas-powered Escort is 2,485 pounds.

This means it takes more energy to move the vehicle. Researchers are working on reducing the weight of future electric vehicles.

The top speed for the electric Escorts is about 85 mph.

"I've never taken the car up to 85 mph, but I have gone 65 mph," Urbanek said. "I didn't want to go any faster because it wouldn't look good to get a ticket in a state vehicle."

The average driving range of the Escorts is 40 miles on a full charge.

"What you need to know is that even though we say you have a range of 40 miles, you will not have solid performance out of the vehicle for all 40 miles," Urbanek said. "There is a significant difference in the vehicle's performance even at a half charge."

"At a half charge, the car will only go zero to 30 in about eight seconds, whereas on a full charge, the car will do it in about six seconds."

The average full-recharge time for the batteries is anywhere from three to 16 hours, depending on the amperage setting on which it's recharging, Urbanek said.

Recharging the car's batteries is as easy as plugging it into a normal wall socket in a house. The recharging plug is where you would fill a gasoline-powered car with fuel.

JILL JARSULIC/Collegian

Research assistant Rod Urbanek draws a schematic of one of K-State's electric cars. The University's two electric Ford Escorts will be phased out and replaced by four electric Ford Rangers built next year.

The cost to drive the electric vehicles is efficient compared to the price you pay per gallon of unleaded gasoline.

"These days a gallon of gas could cost anywhere from $1 to $1.10," Urbanek said. "The cost of charging and driving an electric car equates to about 80 cents per gallon."

Jill Dirksen, research assistant for the K-State Site Operator Program, said the figure varies due to temperature. In warm weather, it can be about 70 cents per gallon, and in cold weather, it can be about 90 cents per gallon.

"The efficiency of the batteries changes with temperature," Urbanek said. "In the winter, the capacity of the batteries is about 50 percent of what it is in the summer."

A common question about electric cars is how the heaters, air conditioners and radios can affect the vehicles' power.

"The car only uses up about 10 percent of the battery power when running heating and cooling," Urbanek said. "The radio hardly uses any power at all, only about 1 percent."

The cars also feature an aspect that enables them to restore some power to the batteries when braking. This is called the regenerative braking system.

Hague said regenerative braking essentially takes the mass and speed of the vehicle, which is kinetic energy, and changes it into potential energy in the batteries.

Basically, when using the brake, the motor turns into a generator and restores some power to the batteries.

"While regenerative braking is efficient, you can only restore back about 10 percent of what you put out," Urbanek said. "Just like with anything else, you never get as much back as you gave out."

Hague said K-State put in the first purchase order for the electric Ford Ranger truck, to be made by Troy Design and Manufacturing. TDM is building the first volume electric-vehicle plant in the world in Manhattan.

"We will be getting the first truck made in that facility," Hague said.

K-State has a purchase order for four electric Rangers to research, test and evaluate. The Rangers will replace the Escorts.

"The Escorts will probably be donated to a supporting Kansas Utility company for future research," Urbanek said.

Hague offered some predictions for the future of electric vehicles.

"There is a lot of risk with electric vehicles," he said. "For the next five years, the electric vehicle will be a novelty item."

"In five to 10 years in the future, the electric vehicle will move into the personal transportation sector, being used as a second vehicle."

Dirksen said the electric vehicle will first gain popularity as a second vehicle. For driving around town on errands, the electric vehicle will be more efficient than a gas-powered car.

"Ten to 20 years from now, with some technological breakthroughs, the electric vehicle will become a standard mode of transportation," Hague said.

Hague went on to say the movement toward electric vehicles resembles the Wright brothers' movement toward flight.

"Just like at Kittyhawk, the Wright brothers failed again and again," he said.

"So will the technology of electric cars," Hague said.

"Now, millions of people fly every day — we even fly people to space."

CITY COMMISSION

Furniture on lawns targets of proposed zoning legislation

Cori Cornelison

staff reporter

Many K-State students might be affected if the city passes its proposed changes of the zoning ordinances and codes.

The proposed changes might make it illegal to place trash cans in front of a residence and to have furniture on front lawns and porches.

Jim Dubois, member of Manhattan Coalition of Neighborhoods, made these recommendations to city commissioners in 1992, but city commissioners did not address the revisions until Tuesday night.

Jerry Petty, director of community development, said the city's current regulations of trash containers indicate that, depending on size and location of the container, Dubois' request would require a code or a zoning ordinance for enforcement.

Zoning generally deals with a large container, such as a dumpster, that is controlled by a planned unit development. This container is not usually found in front of a one- or two-family residence, he said.

The city municipal code requires that trash containers be covered and protected from the elements or invasion by dogs and other animals. The placement of the container is not addressed in the codes.

The city does not have a current code or ordinance zone prohibiting furniture on front porches and lawns.

In the past, the city has dealt with complaints by advising property owners or tenants and negotiating an abatement of the nuisance, Petty said.

If the city were to address this issue, it would be a code-enforcement issue. It is difficult to enforce furniture violations because the situation normally takes care of itself before enforcement action can be taken, he said.

In the past, a porch has been considered a principal structure, and any furniture on a porch would be considered inside the structure and not enforceable, Petty said.

A third issue Dubois said he was concerned about was the enforcement of violators who park vehicles on their lawns. This is now a violation of the Zoning Ordinance.

The ordinance says any vehicle that is parked in the 25-foot, front-yard setback and not on an established driveway is in violation.

The city has one zoning inspector who is responsible for parking violations, sign permits and inspections, and plan review and follow-up inspections for many planned unit development projects, Petty said.

The inspector also is responsible for making sure older structures have conformed to current regulations, he said.

Action was not taken on the issue Tuesday. City commissioners will continue talking about zoning-ordinance and code revisions before action is taken on the issue.

SENATE

Otto said money is not given to groups to advertise membership drives.

Although $40 had been requested for postage, Gaither said an informal ceiling of $16 had been set by the committee.

The Campus Girl Scouts requested $730, and $546.40 was recommended. Again, the biggest cuts came in advertising and postage.

No money was allotted for advertising, and it was recommended $6.40 be allocated for postage instead of $50.

Much of the money requested by the Campus Girl Scouts was to be used for flyers that weren't going to students.

"Any time allocations are not going directly to students, it's not allocated," Brent Wiedeman, agriculture senator, said. These allocations will be voted on at Thursday's Senate meeting.

HISTORY

what the truth is, he said.

Clark said certain medieval authors included sexual connotations. People can read literature and assume the character's actions are homosexual, but the reader might not take into account the time period when the writer or poet lived.

"How can you study and understand history if you don't look at it through their eyes?" Clark said. "It's really hard to do it if you look at that time period through 20th-century eyes."

Clark read a passage from a book about a medieval couple who raised their daughter as a son because during that time period, women could not inherit property.

The book also told of her struggle as she tried to hide her identity and her sexuality, and this is similar to the plight that some gays and lesbians might face, Clark said.

Gays and lesbians want to celebrate their pasts, but at the same time, they respect the past and historical records. Also, the truth about a person's sexual orientation should be known, Clark said.

Greg Eiselein, assistant professor of English, said some students do not want to discuss homosexuality in the classrooms. But students do not realize that some scholars were homosexual. For example, he said, Plato was homosexual, and the writer Louisa May Alcott was a lesbian.

"A big problem is that traditional scholars assume that everybody is straight," Eiselein said.

Eiselein said it is hard to talk about the past if people can't look at it through a homosexual's eyes or continue to apply 20th-century terminology and concepts.

"We shouldn't downfall past works because of what we know today," Eiselein said.

Examining the past in the context of that time period can help people avoid a narrow viewpoint.

Walt Whitman, a writer associated with America and democracy, wrote about his relationships with the same sex.

"When many people talk about how great America is, they don't think to include people are gay," Eiselein said.

He also talked about Louisa May Alcott, a writer who is known for her stories about family values. Many of Alcott's stories expressed her sexual desires in a time period when sex wasn't openly discussed, Eiselein said.

When many politicians talk about family values, they seem to be attacking single mothers and homosexuals, he said.

"I'm saying that gay people are a part of the nation and families. They are an important to American culture," Eiselein said.

Christina Hauck, assistant professor of English, spoke about a woman who was a lesbian and poet.

Sappho, a poet who lived on the island of Lesbos, was a lesbian, but she ended up declaring her undying love for a man.

"We don't know enough factual information about Sappho, but there are many arguments about her sexuality," Hauck said.

She said that she chose to talk about Sappho because it seems ironic that she is known for being a lesbian and a poet, but male writers will not acknowledge these facts.

"Everything that is written about her denies that she was a lesbian," Hauck said. "The correlation seems to say that lesbians can't be poets."

Hauck said the best way to study the past is to first admit the things that you know about a people.

"You must look at the evidence that is there, instead of assuming what's going on," Hauck said. "First we must acknowledge it, and then you can work with it."

VAN ATTA

The media should also consider its involvement and coverage of terrorist activities.

"We help ferment terrorism by giving them the attention they want. Sometimes, it's just best to ignore them," Van Atta said.

However, media attention given to the Unabomber has actually helped officials investigate his identity, he said.

"The printing of that manifesto has led to the identification of the Unabomber," Van Atta said.

Although authorities have not located the alleged criminal, more information has been uncovered, and officials are working on a new composite, he said.

"I think they are zeroing in," he said.

But caution should be taken when investigating any story, Van Atta said.

"No scoop was worth one person being killed," he said.

Van Atta made everyone at the lecture more aware of what really is going on, Chad Weber, sophomore in biology, said.

"He offered another viewpoint," Weber said.

Van Atta said he wanted to present a realistic viewpoint and the realities of a hostile nuclear incident. "The challenge is to remain as great as America has been in the past," Van Atta said.

"The country we have is so great that it can survive one of these problems," he said.

The lecture was sponsored by the Union Program Council Issues and Ideas Committee.

Payroll system changes

■ New system costs
$1.1 million to implement

Jamie Willey
staff reporter

K-State employees will soon be paid on a different payroll system that will enable department heads to easily access employees' records.

The Human Resource Information System is based on a system of software called People Soft. Tom Schellhardt, associate vice-president of administration and finance, said.

The new system cost about $1.1 million to implement. HRIS would have cost $1.5 million to implement if the University had not worked so closely with the University of Kansas and the state of Kansas.

John Struve, University budget director, said implementation of the new computer system is being paid for by reallocation of funds within the campus.

Last fiscal year the University reallocated $150,000 that was used to purchase the new software. This fiscal year, $200,000 was reallocated primarily for a computer to handle all payroll transactions and to be used as a network server, Struve said.

Schellhardt said in addition to the reallocation of funds computer network services, office of information systems and human resource services are helping to pay for the implementation of the system through their budgets.

Some departments will have to reallocate money within their own departments to upgrade to more sophisticated computers to handle the new payroll system, Struve said.

Human Resource Services also had to reallocate money for staff training of the new system, Struve said. He said there is a large amount of training involved in using the new computer system.

Struve also said computing information systems reallocated funds and staff to install the new system. Existing staff was temporarily switched from their old jobs to the job of installing the new system.

Jennifer Gehrt, assistant director of payroll and operations for Human Resource Services, said HRIS will improve the tracking of hours worked by employees.

HRIS will incorporate a windows based software program enabling the various departments to record employees' hours on a weekly basis, Gehrt said. Beginning Jan. 12, 1996, K-State employees will be paid biweekly instead of once a month.

The old system recorded hours on a monthly basis, which made it difficult to view when a person was working overtime during a work week.

Tom Schellhardt, associate vice-president of administration and finance, said HRIS will produce on-line historical information and generate much better reports.

Departments will also have increased control of payroll data and employee information. Control by the departments will allow quicker processing and access by the departments, he said.

Employees will also have their paychecks directly deposited into their bank accounts by the state.

► GAY RIGHTS

Homosexuals face discrimination

Camille Wood
staff reporter

Prejudice against homosexual rights has crept into America's legal system, a lecturer for the Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual Week said Wednesday.

Charlene Smith, attorney and Washburn University professor, spoke with nearly 40 people, ensuring awareness of the legal implications homosexual and bisexual college students face.

"You really have a legal right to exist and to make your position stronger by having weeks like this," Smith said.

The largest problem gay, lesbian and bisexual students are facing on campus, and everywhere else, is discrimination and problems related to their sexual preferences and way of life, she said.

"Discrimination isn't an accepted form of behavior," Smith said. "It really is debilitating."

The solution to discrimination at rallies, orientation, assemblies and speeches includes talking out

► GROUNDBREAKING

Building begins for electric car facility

Brent Johnson
staff reporter

Not even a black cat walking in front of the podium during the groundbreaking ceremony could have ruined the moment.

Holding bronzed shovels decorated with purple ribbons, representatives from Troy Design and Manufacturing Co., K-State, Manhattan and the state of Kansas lined up to break the ground.

On the count of three, they plunged their shovels into the dirt, symbolizing the future of electric vehicles and Manhattan.

TDM is constructing the first facility in the world to volume produce electric Ford Rangers. The facility will also conduct research and development for alternatively fueled vehicles.

"This isn't going to be just a plant," said Bill Coppola, managing director of electric vehicle development for TDM. "There's going to be some engineering activity going on here."

Bill Roberts, president of TDM, said he was really surprised and awed by the support and interest of the community.

"The opportunity came, and we decided to try to establish Manhattan as the exclusive alternative-vehicle center of the world," Roberts said.

"From this fall on, hopefully K-State, Manhattan and Kansas will be linked to the future of the automobile industry," K-State President John Wefald said.

Bringing TDM to Manhattan was a team effort made by K-State, Kansas Electric Utilities Research Program, Kansas Technological Enterprise Corporation, Western Resources and the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

Even U.S. Senator Bob Dole, R-

Kan., shares the same excitement as Manhattan and TDM does, Roberts said.

TDM is under contract with Ford to manufacture 2,000 electric Rangers. The plant is under deadline to be open and ready by Feb. 15, with the first vehicle finished by March 31.

The company will be hiring 99 percent of its employees from Manhattan, Coppola said.

"We'll probably start hiring as soon as early December," he said.

TDM will train all the new employees in Detroit, in a plant just like the one TDM is building in Manhattan. When the employees get back to Manhattan, they can start immediately on the production of the electric Rangers, Coppola said.

"By the time they get back, the vehicles will be waiting for them, ready to be processed," he said.

Dunn Industrial Group Inc. has been contracted to construct Manhattan's TDM facility.

"We hope to get construction underway within the next week to 10 days," said Rob Traut, project director for Dunn Industrial Group Inc. "We still have to get a few permits."

Traut said he is confident they will have the facility finished by the deadline. The construction of the new TDM plant will be their sole project until finished.

"Although I'm not sure how many, I do know we'll be hiring some local help for the construction of this facility," he said.

Mayor Edith Stunkel said everyone is very excited about TDM setting up shop in Manhattan, and the future electric vehicles offer.

"Someday, cities across the country will thank Manhattan, Kansas for cleaning their air," Stunkel said.

City/University joint project links libraries

Brent Johnson
staff reporter

K-State libraries and the Manhattan Public Library will soon be linked by computer.

"The connection will enable you to view databases at either library," Karen Cole, associate dean of Farrell Library, said. "That means you could view items available at Farrell while sitting behind a computer terminal at Manhattan Public Library."

Brice Hobrock, dean of Farrell Library, said the K-State libraries have been jointly designing the plan with representatives from Manhattan Public Library for more than a year.

"We've been trying to get the infrastructure in place for a community information system for about a year now," he said.

The libraries project is titled "Manhattan Global Village," and the goal is to interconnect Manhattan Public and K-State Libraries. This will connect the two catalog systems, allowing users to access resources at both libraries, Cole said.

"This project will also allow users of Manhattan Public Library to have access to Kansas Regents libraries and K-State-Salina," Hobrock said.

Inversely, the project will allow students to access resources available at Manhattan Public Library from computers in Farrell.

John Struve, director of K-State Budget Office, said the city commission approved the first phase of the three-year request from the City/University Fund.

On Aug. 15, the city commission approved $33,000 to K-State Libraries for the first phase in starting a connection with Manhattan Public Library, he said.

The fund was created when K-State was annexed by the city. Money in the fund comes from taxes on campus and is supposed to go to projects that benefit both the city and University.

Dean moves to University of Tennessee

Phil Roberts
staff reporter

Picking up and moving to Tennessee means fresh opportunities for the assistant director of Academic Programs at the College of Agriculture

John Riley, was named Dean of the College of Agricultural Sciences and Natural Resources at the University of Tennessee at Knoxville.

"This is basically a professional advancement for me," Riley said. "University of Tennessee will allow me to advance further in my field and give me more administration responsibility."

Prior to being named the assistant director of Academic Programs in 1985, Riley served as a faculty member in the Department of Agricultural Economics from 1973 to 1985.

"I wasn't surprised that he was selected," David Mugler, director of Academic Programs, said. "He had an excellent track record with the students and did an excellent job of recruitment and placement of students."

The University of Tennessee at Knoxville had been in the process of doing a national search to find a new dean of the College of Agricultural Sciences and Natural Resources. Riley was then named to the position after a referral by Mugler.

"In the educational system, you pretty much have to go to a different school in order for advancement," Riley said. "I'm not leaving with any bad feelings or anything, I just went as far as I could go

SIGN LANGUAGE MAY FULFILL FOREIGN LANGUAGE REQUIREMENT AT KU

LAWRENCE (AP) — University of Kansas students might soon be able to meet their foreign-language requirement without worrying about tricky pronunciation or conjugating exotic verbs.

Kansas could become the first college in the state to allow students to fulfill a foreign-language requirement by taking American Sign Language.

The College of Liberal Arts has approved the idea, and implementation awaits development of a sign-language program.

Sally Roberts, professor of special education, said sign language is more practical for most students than a foreign language.

She said graduates are more likely to encounter a deaf person in everyday life than someone who only speaks French, German or Japanese.

"I feel like American Sign Language is a language that is more usable than a foreign language might be," Roberts said.

About 15 other universities nationwide allow students to take sign language instead of a spoken foreign language, Roberts said.

CLARIFICATIONS

- In the Oct. 11 story "Furniture on lawns targets of proposed zoning legislation," the story implied that all furniture could be prohibited on porches. The ordinance would only prohibit certain types of furniture.
- The same story also implied that Jim Dubois was the sole person making recommendations about the ordinances. Dubois is merely a spokesman for the Manhattan Coalition of Neighborhoods, which had many members contribute to the recommendations.

CORRECTIONS

- In the Oct. 11 issue of the Collegian, it was reported in "Furniture on lawns targets of proposed zoning legislation" that the city does not have a current code or ordinance zone prohibiting furniture on lawns. The City of Manhattan already prohibits furniture on the lawn. The Collegian regrets the error.
- In the Oct. 11 Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Symposium graphic, Denise Leopold was listed as a minister from Manhattan Christian College. Leopold is actually a minister from Metropolitan Christian Church. Also, the 7 p.m. presentation by Charlene Smith was listed as being at the Union Little Theatre. It was in Denison 142. The Collegian regrets the errors.
- In the Oct. 11 Collegian, the letter by Sarah L. Kanning had two errors made by Collegian staff. One sentence read, "... that we do deserve the rights and privileges of straight people ...". It should have said "... that we do deserve the rights, privileges and responsibilities of straight people ...". Also, another sentence read, "... the ones who numb themselves with alcohol or drugs, or go crazy with the knowledge there is still no place for them in this heterosexual society." The sentence should have concluded with "... heterosexual society." The Collegian regrets the error.

Aqua Cow helps weak cows to stand

■ Device increases survival rate of diseased cows; fewer put to sleep

B.C. Camp II
staff reporter

The cows are coming home and hopping in the swimming pool down at K-State's College of Veterinary Medicine.

The Aqua Cow, an enclosed tank designed to float cows, arrived at K-State Tuesday.

The privately donated tank allows water to raise chin-high on a cow.

The water allows cattle that have difficulty standing because of diseases or fractures to use their natural buoyancy to stand.

The new technology provides a much higher survival rate for diseased cattle, said Dr. David Van Metre, assistant professor of veterinary medicine.

"The tank allows us to get a cow to stand after we've treated whatever cause was making them sick," Van Metre said.

If a cow remains recumbent and unable to stand or move about, the sheer weight of their body on their muscle beds will result in the loss of muscle functions, he said.

"Using conventional techniques only allowed for about 33-percent survival rate, whereas the Aqua Cow has a 90-percent survival rate. This prevents us from having to put cows to sleep that could no longer function," he said.

K-State has joined the ranks of veterinary schools like the University of California, University of Florida and Cornell University that have an Aqua Cow. The University of California provided K-State with the data on the Aqua Cow.

"It's not a complicated piece of equipment at all. It's quite simple. The only difficult part is getting the cows in the tank."

DR. DAVID VAN METRE
ASSISTANT PROFESSOR OF VETERINARY MEDICINE

"The University of California has been using one for about three years now," Van Metre said.

"From what we've gathered from their data, it takes about four to six days at six to eight hours a day to get a cow back on its feet."

Untrained observers of the Aqua Cow might think it looks like someone tossed a cow in a big red dumpster, Van Metre said.

They would not guess that there were more than 10 years of research put into the Aqua Cow, he said.

"It was developed over a decade ago in Holland for use on dairy cows," Van Metre said.

"It's not a complicated piece of equipment at all. It's quite simple. The only difficult part is getting the cows in the tank," he said.

Although the Aqua Cow is a simple piece of equipment, it will provide Kansas veterinarians and producers with an effective treatment for the frustrating problem of downed cattle, Van Metre said.

The College of Veterinary Medicine hasn't worked out a fee yet, but Van Metre said they will try to keep the tank cost-effective.

"It takes about 850 gallons of water to fill the tank," Van Metre said. "We will have to charge for the water and the labor, of course. It's not easy getting a 1,500-pound stationary cow into the tank."

If the Aqua Cow works out, the vet-med college might consider investing in a larger version of the tank.

The tank can only hold up to 1,800 pounds and isn't large enough for bulls or larger cattle.

"I think it will get a lot of use," Van Metre said. "It's a major advance in our ability to treat diseases in cattle. We have high hopes for the Aqua Cow."

► AFFIRMATIVE ACTION

Video conference panel debates affirmative action

Holly McConkey
staff reporter

Issues of affirmative action have flared debate nationwide within minority, as well as white, communities.

More than 50 K-State students and faculty members continued the debate Wednesday by attending a live, via-satellite video conference in the Union Big 8 Room. Panel members discussed "Affirmative Action Under Siege: What's at Stake for Our Campuses, Careers and Communities?"

The video conference, which was broadcast to colleges and universities nationwide, allowed people to call in, voice their opinions and ask questions of the panel members.

The panel, made-up of scholars and national leaders, was divided on whether it is time to do away with affirmative action, or whether it is still a viable method of keeping minorities and women equal in the workplace and on campuses.

Stephen Balch, a panel member who opposed affirmative action, said that people should be judged on individual levels and that group rights should not exist based on their background and history.

"Take a look at history. There is a belief that civil rights applied to all Americans. Now there is objective policy that gives certain people more rights," Balch said. "You don't want to make political or educational judgments based on someone's background or racial ancestry."

Patricia Ireland, president of the National Organization for Women, said those who oppose affirmative action have assumed that America has achieved Martin Luther King Jr.'s dream of equality for everyone. She said this is not true because most top-level jobs in this country are still held by white men.

Panel member, Earl Smith, said racial issues only fog the advancement of minorities.

"We must lock arms if we are going to be competitive. It's important for us all to learn history, but to complicate it continuously causes a problem," he said.

Smith proposed a four-point plan to help control discrimination while doing away with affirmative action. Part of this plan would include punishing those companies who chose to discriminate in the marketplace on a case-by-case basis.

Hispanic Heritage Month

"The plan would be based on merit. The market will punish those who discriminate. They will eventually go out of business," he said.

Panel member, Elaine Jones, director/counsel of National Association for the Advancement of Colored People Legal Defense and Educational Fund, said it is important to talk about the real tradition of minorities and not the ideal tradition.

"There was an enshrined notion of slavery in the constitution from the very beginning," she said.

Julianne Malveau, panel mediator, said if America refuses to learn from history, it is doomed to repeat the past.

"The Supreme Court is dismantling, brick by brick, the progress of our ancestors," she said.

Michael Forrest, executive director of the National Association of Colleges and Employers, said there is a backlash happening that is unbelievable.

White people are feeling disregarded, he said.

Clyde Howard, director of unclassified affirmative action, said he thought it was important to people who attended the video conference to realize there is a continuing need for affirmative action.

"It raised issues that are present on this campus and all over the country," he said.

Joint library project eases strain on researchers

The Manhattan Global Village program will ensure library patrons can get the materials they need as quickly as possible.

K-State libraries and the Manhattan Public Library are instituting a joint program that will be a boon to both K-State students and Manhattan residents.

The new program is called Manhattan Global Village.

Through this new computer link-up, patrons of both libraries will have immediate access to the materials of the other.

Besides electronically combining these two Manhattan libraries, patrons will also have access to the libraries at Kansas Board of Regents universities and the library at K-State-Salina.

This new service is an excellent addition to the opportunities K-State students already have to order books from other libraries through the inter-library loan service at Farrell Library.

The inter-library loan service has at Farrell has been available for 40 or 50 years, Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said.

K-State students already have the opportunity to take advantage of a quick and efficient inter-library loan program.

But usually only graduate students use this program.

"We will mainly be serving undergraduates electronically in the future," Hobrock said.

The Manhattan Global Village program will ensure library patrons can get the materials they need as quickly as possible.

This was a wise allocation of funds by the Manhattan city commission.

Funding for the project comes from campus taxes that were allocated when K-State was annexed by Manhattan.

Students will now have less reason to use the I-couldn't-find-the-book excuse when they turn in their assignments.

CARNEY RESPONDS

Editor,

I certainly love a lively debate, and I believe it is essential all the facts are put on the table about this concert so we all can put it behind us.

In reviewing the individual opinions of Jason Rucker and Graig Behnke, I understand they made some critical errors in expressing their opinions, and it is important for us to cover those issues.

First, Rucker, one of the points you made was why we did not bring Hootie and the Blowfish or the Cranberries to K-State. Simple — they did concerts in late August in Kansas City, and their tours did not take them through the region during the time we schedule our concerts.

Furthermore, Union Programming Council looked at groups like Green Day and the Red Hot Chili Peppers, but they were asking for well over $100,000 as a contract guarantee and still would not come to Manhattan because we are a college town with a strong country-music reputation.

Secondly, we did not find out Spul Asylum was playing in Kansas City until after we had already made an offer to the band.

But, even with that in mind, Spul Asylum's tour in Washington, D.C. had drawn over 80,000 people to Robert F. Kennedy Stadium, so we adjusted our attendance numbers down to keep the Kansas City show in mind, but not ridiculously low.

To Rucker's remarks about bringing what the students want, we conduct surveys and visitations throughout the year, independently of any other organization.

With more than 3,000 surveys returned, the one single event students want on this campus is a major concert which features either rock 'n' roll or alternative music. Your analogy to free proctology exams is ridiculous.

Next, you said there are no "hard-core Soul Asylum fans." If you would have attended the concert, you would have met more than 1,000 fans in this area who were willing to pay $18 to hear them play.

On to Mr. Behnke. I felt it was extremely important to closely review your opinions and issues because of the way you presented them. First, you are right.

We did expect to take a loss on this concert. In fact, when we schedule these concerts, we want to offer them at a lower price to students so they do not feel they can just go to Kansas City or Lawrence and see the band there.

This is why we have a student fee. Were you under the impression that we make money, or even break even, on our lectures, movies, or art showings?

Guess what? You're wrong!

We use the programming money allocated to us to subsidize these events at lower prices so students can enjoy them without shelling out a lot of money. We think students like it.

Secondly, there are students at K-State who like country music. For that reason, Bramlage Coliseum already programs major country music acts like Garth Brooks, Brooks, Dunn and many others. Furthermore, Bramlage has been losing money on those big-name acts as well.

As for your remarks about my music agenda, UPC has yet to bring a band to Manhattan that I personally want to see. The Special Events Committee, along with our surveys, make the decision on which band we offer a contract to play at K-State.

Finally, Behnke, I would recommend that you run for a political office. Your veiled threat that student government should cut our fee because of this concert is something I would expect from a master politician. Well done, sir.

Overall, I would like to express the opinion that K-State students have the right to select which events they will attend and which ones they won't. When I get asked if we shouldn't just accept that Manhattan will have a country-music scene and we should all go to Lawrence, I get very upset.

There have been many attempts to build an alternative-music scene in Manhattan. When people talk to me about bringing in groups like Van Halen or Harry Connick Jr. that would run in the upper $100,000, my response is that I would love to do that.

But, if we can't get the support from our students for a $40,000 concert, how can I justify that decision to the administration of the Union because of the jeopardy that it puts them in as well as UPC?

We can research and publicize until we are blue in the face, but unless students support these programs, we will never prove to those administrators we answer to that the financial risk we are taking with concerts is truly worth it.

As I have said before, Rucker and Behnke, if you want a direct voice in the activities surrounding the concerts Special Events plans, become a member of UPC.

We are constantly running market surveys through Contemporary Music, Columbia Records and at least three different radio stations and music-purchasing houses to see which groups are hot, which we could use your help with, contrary to what Scott Allen Miller's review would have us all believe.

Patrick Carney senior in political science and UPC president

Living with computers means

Living with mistakes

If you read my column last week, you might have noticed, under my photo, the name "Derek Seabourn." In the immortal words of Tricky Dick Nixon, "Let me make this perfectly clear": my name is not Derek Seabourn.

I have never been a Derek, nor do I have any intention of becoming one. The name Derek — no offense to all you Dereks out there — is a soap-opera invention.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF DEREK

(An excerpt from "The Young and the Ridiculous")

Mona is married to Erik, but she is also having an illicit love affair with Dave.

Dave has just left Mona's love nest when there is a knock on the door. Mona, fully expecting Dave to have returned for his trousers, opens the door only to find Erik, her husband.

Mona: "Da ... Erik?"

Erik: "DEREK? WHO'S DEREK?"

Mona: "Da wreck, I mean 'the wreck,' you survived the wreck."

Erik: "What wreck?"

Mona: "The wreck you were supposed to have on the way to your Impotents Anonymous support-group meeting."

Erik: "WHAT IMPOTENTS ANONYMOUS MEETING? THAT'S NOT IN THE SCRIPT!"

As you can see, if Erik had remembered the script and gone to his support-group meeting, he would now be in a 500-episode coma as the result of a head-on collision with a Gideon Bible distributor (these guys are everywhere), giving scriptwriters ample time to figure out what to do with this new guy called Derek.

Unfortunately, my wife has become somewhat attached to the name change and has introduced it into numerous personal aspects of our relationship.

My Wife: "Ohhhh Deeeereek ... yes, yes, YES!"

Me: "All I did was take out the trash."

My Wife: "But there is just something about the name DEREK and those heavy-duty trash bags with the pull-ties that really excites me."

As a matter of fact, my name is actually O. J. Simpson, and I would just like the whole world to know I intend to take every last penny of the money I had stashed in my Bronco when I was fleeing Los Angeles just before being arrested and use it to find the real killers of Nicole and Ron.

Well, no, FIRST I am going to get married, then I am going to find the killers.

No, ACTUALLY I am going to get married, do an infomercial with my good pal, Tom Brokaw, write a few "O.J. Simpson: How I Beat the Rap (and I don't mean music)" books — you know, to get my career back on track — AND THEN I'm going to get those killers.

Also, would someone please tell Rosie Grier that he can stop coming to visit me any time now. Thank you very much.

Just a little post-O.J. trial humor there.

However, while I am on the subject of disgusting human beings, how about Mark Furhman?

He pleaded the Fifth so many times he just HAD to be guilty of something in the O.J. case, or so it seems.

What many people don't realize is he was instructed by his lawyers to plead the Fifth to ANY question. Johnny Cockroach simply didn't ask the right questions.

Cochran: "Did you plant evidence at the crime scene on Bundy?"

Furhman: "I invoke my Fifth Amendment privilege."

Cochran: "Did you assassinate President Kennedy?"

Furhman: "I invoke my Fifth Amendment privilege."

Cochran: "Did you blow up the Hindenburg?"

Furhman: "I invoke my Fifth Amendment privilege."

Cochran (venomously): "IS YOUR NAME DEREK?"

Furhman (in shock): "Okay, okay, okay. I really did blow up the Hindenburg."

Seriously, errors are a constant problem in the newspaper business. No matter how hard we writers and editors try, no matter how many computer witch doctors (or "oldies" radio disc-jockeys) we call in to chant "OOGAH CHAHKA OOGAH OOGAH CHAHKA" throughout the newsroom, these silly computers continue to screw things up.

For instance, as a demonstration, I am going to type some TOTALLY

SERIOUS information into my computer RIGHT NOW, and through the magic of (hold on, I am going to get technical here) "data transfer," what I type becomes the following:

"The House today voted unanimously to give itself a 200-percent pay raise. The newly-elected Speaker of the House, Newt 'TAD-POLE HEAD' Gingrich, abstained from voting."

Did you see it? DID YOU SEE THAT? What you just saw is a perfect example of the totally absurd inaccuracies and errors we journalists have to deal with on a daily basis.

I typed "20-percent pay raise," and the computer — without having to draw it a picture or threaten it with an early bedtime — added another zero by the time this column went to press and gave you, the perceptive reader, "200-percent pay raise."

How that zero (you too, Newt) got there is anybody's guess.

How my name got changed to Derek is also anybody's guess.

But, just in case, ... "OOGAH CHAHKA OOGAH OOGAH OOGAH CHAHKA."

UPC needs financial savvy

Last week, the musical group Soul Asylum appeared on our campus to a nice crowd of 1,176 in Bramlage Coliseum, which normally holds more than 12,000.

Amid cries Manhattan's alternative-music scene is dead or dying and Lawrence is drawing more K-Staters for live music than Aggieville, the Union Program Council, the fine folks who put together the concert, admitted they lost about $40,000 on the concert, according to the Collegian.

Normally, this kind of thing wouldn't bother me.

I mean, I like Soul Asylum about as much as the next guy, and if someone wanted to bring it in for a concert by putting up their own capital and taking risk in the hope of breaking even, that would be great.

However, UPC does not have to do this kind of thing. Through the payment of student fees, UPC is allocated a certain amount of money a semester and hence, can do things like this more freely.

Although the amount actually allocated to UPC is small, it is about time organizations such as UPC learned to live within their means.

This does not mean we should lock UPC in a room and throw away the key, but it does mean UPC should be more responsible for what it does.

This might even mean bringing in acts that can make money. It could even be so far to bring in country acts, which virtually sell out Bramlage every time they come into town.

Although these acts might not have the cultural caliber UPC is looking for, it is time that UPC begin to behave like everyone else in the real world, except the federal government, and keep its head above water on its own.

Reducing mandatory student fees and replacing them with user fees could mean even higher ticket prices, and it is a concept that's time has come.

I think I speak for many when I say I don't mind paying higher prices for something as long as I choose what it is.

It is neither just nor fair to force every student to subsidize the decisions made by the entertainment tastes of a few.

It is also irresponsible for UPC to bring in acts it knows can't break even, despite their immense cultural value and meaning.

According to local radio station KXBB-FM 104.7, UPC planned on losing $17,000 on the concert to begin with.

Would anyone like to invest in a company that planned on losing $17,000? Not likely.

UPC can do this because it doesn't have to break even; it just has to hope enough students enroll to pay enough student fees to cover its losses.

Please understand. I do not think UPC is the worst thing since the discovery that Santa wasn't real. I believe UPC is engaged in trying to provide good programming for the campus.

I am simply saying it should be more responsible with my money and yours or learn to go it alone.

User fees are looking more like a reality as people are becoming fed up with paying for things they don't use, regardless of how insignificant the cost is.

It's only human.

For those of you who are interested in live music, Jars of Clay and PFR will be in concert at McCain Auditorium Dec. 3.

Tickets will be available soon at McCain and Christian Books and Gifts. This concert is sponsored by Heart for Youth and receives no money from UPC.

THE CHARACTERS

COSTUME CREW MEMBERS PLAY AN IMPORTANT PART BEHIND THE SCENES PREPARING FOR PRODUCTION

Joni Pruitt
staff reporter

Editor's note: This is the first in a five-part series outlining the behind-the-scenes work in the production of the K-State Theatre play "The Music Man."

The curtains close. The applause roars. The actors take a bow. And one group of important people often goes virtually unrecognized.

But without their invisible hands, the characters in the play would look significantly different.

They'd be naked.

The opening night for the K-State Theatre's production of "The Music Man" is not until November 16.

But behind the scenes, the costume crew is frantically sewing. They have only six weeks to finish making more than 70 costume pieces with 210 different looks for the production.

By the time the costumes are completed, the crew will have put in more than 65 hours per costume.

"Sometimes I lay awake all night and think, 'It's not going to get done,'" said Dana Pinkston, assistant professor of theater and costume designer.

"But one of the things we're trying to do here is to not kill ourselves yet maintain quality work. People don't realize the amount of work that goes into things."

The costume stitchers have a set of deadlines they must meet, and as the deadlines near, the intensity increases.

"It can be a stressful thing," Alison Funston, costume shop supervisor, said. "We have to meet the deadline, or else the opening night, people go naked. My first year here, I would sleep on the ironing boards. There are never enough hours in the day."

"I remember in Hello 'Dolly,' I was sewing right up until intermission to finish the costumes for Act 4," she said.

Pinkston said people often think the costumes in a production are bought or rented. But nothing could be further from the truth.

Almost every costume that will be on stage in "The Music Man" has been carefully researched, tailored and crafted in a tiny cove in the basement of McCain Auditorium.

The place has a magical quality, like Santa's workshop. Inside, sewing machines hum, and the soundtrack from the Broadway musical "Beauty and the Beast" fills the air as the six paid stitchers and three volunteers sew.

Cartoon sketches of costume designs, patterns and sample materials are plastered to the walls. Brightly colored fabrics, nearly finished costumes and bed-sized ironing boards are scattered throughout the room.

Although the work in the costume shop is in its final stages, the actual planning for the costumes began in February, when Pinkston began researching the costumes.

"The Music Man" takes place in 1912, and the costumes must reflect that era. Pinkston compiled more than 200 pages of research from the local libraries about how clothes were made, the time period, the location and the social, political and cultural trends of the musical.

Also, to save time in the costume-design process, Pinkston ordered historical patterns from 1912 and altered the patterns.

"The hardest part is that women at that time had a 19-inch waist," Marla Day, senior in apparel design, said. "Today, obviously, they don't, but we still have to create that look."

Once the research was complete, Pinkston and director Luke Kahlich began to discuss design ideas for the musical.

"The design team was influenced by the painter Grant Wood," she said. "We're using oranges, greens and browns."

She said the first scene will use landscape colors until the music man comes out on stage in his aqua and pink plaid suit.

At the start of Act 2, the characters will appear in brighter colors to reflect the excitement and interest he brings into their lives, she said.

"This is a show about fabric and patterns," Pinkston said. "We wanted to do a 'Music Man' that wasn't the traditional one used in high school. We wanted to make a statement with colors and fabrics."

In July, Pinkston began sketching her ideas for the costumes and searching for the fabric in Kansas City.

"It's a lot harder than people think," Pinkston said. "It's hard to find fabric because everyone has the same thing. It takes a lot of experience. You have to know what you want but be flexible enough to change your mind if you can't find what you're looking for."

For example, Pinkston said she is turning one of the silk fabrics inside

Pinkston's poster-sized caricatures on the walls are her way of communicating her ideas for the costumes to the stitchers.

"My primary design element is the actor's body," she said. "Sometimes they don't have the body I want so I manipulate it with padding. I can make a person look taller or shorter, or fatter or thinner."

Most of the volunteers or workers who are making the costumes are apparel and textile majors who have had extensive sewing experience.

"I've been sewing since I was five," Christine Shaneyfelt, senior in musical theater, said. "I've improved since then — I promise."

Once a costume is completed, the character tries on the costume again to see if any additional size alterations need to be made.

"Costume designers have it the worst," Pinkston said. "We never know until the first dress rehearsal what the costume will look like on stage. At that point, it's a little too late to fix, but it's very gratifying to sit in the audience and say, 'I did that.'"

"And I know that it only got done because a zillion other people helped me."

Cats can't let ranking go to their heads

The Wildcat football team is ranked No. 8 in the nation.

You would think the players would be psyched up.

You would think the players would be bragging about it.

They're not.

"It's nice to be recognized," said Chris Canty, defensive back for the Cats, of his team's ranking.

Not exactly the macho, cocky response you'd expect to hear from a football player. But then again, Chad May isn't around anymore.

The Cats talked the talk the last time they were ranked in the Top 10 near the end of last season.

They said they deserved better than the Aloha Bowl.

They said they would easily beat Boston College.

They didn't.

It seems the Cats learned a lesson after all that talk — back up the ranking with your play, not your words, which is exactly what they're doing. Coach Snyder has even noticed a difference in how this year's squad handles success.

"I would be surprised if our players were responding giddily to what is going on around them," he said. "I don't think they see it for anything more than it really is."

"But I can't tell you we responded really well when we got this high last time."

Receiver Tyson Schwiager said he agreed with Snyder.

"We didn't handle the success very well. We thought we were a lot better than we really were," he said.

It's a good thing the Cats seemingly haven't let the latest ranking go to their heads.

With just one Big 8 win against Missouri under their belts, the Cats still face games against nationally ranked Nebraska (No. 2 in the USA Today/CNN coaches' poll), Kansas (No. 9), Oklahoma (No. 12), and Colorado (No. 10).

But while K-State faces unranked, 1-4 Oklahoma State this weekend in Stillwater, the game isn't a given "W" for the Cats.

Don't let Oklahoma State's record fool you. Two of the Cowboys' losses have been to nationally ranked opponents, Nebraska and Tennessee. Although the Cats will be the third ranked team to face the Pokes in six weeks, Oklahoma State is in a prime position for a big upset, an upset of KU-Colorado proportions.

It could happen. Just look what OSU has in its corner.

The Cowboys have had time to focus on K-State since they had last week off. (KU also had a week to prepare for Colorado.)

It's Homecoming in Stillwater, so the Cats can expect a large crowd of Cowboy fans and alumni. And, in case you've forgotten, Oklahoma State almost pulled off an upset two years ago, the last time K-State visited Stillwater. It took "The Drive," compliments of Cats' quarterback Chad May, to claim a K-State victory in the final minute of the game.

That was a heartbreaking loss for the Cowboys, and you can bet they haven't forgotten it.

Oklahoma State also claims the league's second leading rusher, junior tailback David Thompson.

Thompson averages 119.63 yards per game, making him the 20th-ranked rusher nationwide.

While a win in Stillwater could vault the Cats into the Top Five, as well as give K-State its first 6-0 start in 85 years, defensive end Nyle Wren said the Oklahoma State game is, "just another Saturday."

"It doesn't matter where you are ranked in the middle of the season," Wren said. "For us, the main thing is to keep winning."

Huskers win in three

■ K-State unable to earn first-ever win against Nebraska

Shana Newell
staff writer

The streak is alive.

That is what Nebraska fans might have been saying as they left Ahearn Field House Wednesday night after a Husker victory against K-State.

The Wildcats dropped their third-straight Big 8 match last night in front of a crowd of 2,842 as the Huskers extended their 51-match winning streak against K-State. The Cats lost the match in three games, 4-15, 6-15, and 8-15.

K-State refused to go down without a fight, however. Coach Jim Moore gave the squad a pep talk in the middle of the third game.

"At 8-1, I called the timeout. I said to forget it if you're going to play like they're going to beat you," he said.

"I told them I wanted it at 8-15 by the end of the match."

The score was exactly 8-15, but in the Husker's favor. The Cats made Nebraska earn every point and refused to go down easy.

"It's a good sign because we lost the first two games, and then the third game they had to earn every point, and we fought for it," freshman blocker Val Wieck said.

Although the Cats made a stand against Nebraska, Moore said the Cats are still not at the level they need to be to consistently win like the Huskers.

"They're a team that when they get into a groove, they're not going to have mental lapses," Moore said. "It's a real high level of play and we're not there."

Junior middle blocker Kate DeClerk admits that fear might have had an impact on the Cats' performance early in the match.

"The first two games, it didn't feel like we played the way we could, but the third game it started to come around," DeClerk said.

"Everyone started to loosen up and said what the heck."

"The first two games it was almost like we were all scared," she said.

K-State refused to lie down for the Huskers. Although they lost the match, the Cats were able to accomplish some things for themselves.

"We could have rolled over and played dead, but we wanted to work on our side of the net, and we got some things done," Wieck said.

The Cats hit .190 for the match, with their strongest game statistically being their first, when they hit .306.

Wieck emerged from the match having hit .471 with 10 kills, two digs and four block assists. She only committed one error.

Sophomore setter Devon Rynning had 40 set assists, four digs, one solo block and one block assist.

DeClerk tied Wieck for a team high of 10 kills, hitting .250. She also contributed defensively with six digs, three solo blocks and four block assists.

Freshman hitter Kim Zschau led the team with 11 digs and had two block assists.

The Cats travel to Lawrence Saturday to take on KU.

Moore all but promises a winning season for the Cats but said Nebraska was tough to beat. He said he hopes the loss doesn't turn away the fans who brought a record crowd to Wednesday's match.

"I don't think I've ever said this, but I feel disappointed for them," Moore said. "I know they came in hoping we could at least take a game from them, but please don't abandon us."

"We'll be there this year, but they're such a tough team."

Students favor improved ticket distribution system

It's a lot better for us. We didn't have the manpower to keep people at Ahearn looking for the flag. This really increases our chances for getting better seats.

JUNIOR, BIOLOGY AND PRE-MEDICINE

Todd Stewart
assistant sports editor

The race for the front row of Bramlage Coliseum has begun at Ahearn Field House.

The annual basketball ticket campout began Wednesday morning outside Ahearn, and tents, couches and tarps went up shortly after.

"It's kind of fun," Ryan Norman, junior in biology and pre-medicine, said. "We got up at 6 a.m. to set up."

Norman said he was part of the Smurthwaite House and Smith House team. He said people from each house signed up for blocks of time and it worked out to about three hours per person.

Natasha Alford, freshman in theater and member of the team ICAT Sucks, said she thought the campout was going to be fun.

"I think it'll be kind of fun," Alford said. "There's a lot of stuff to do."

Norman's teammate, Becky Heine, freshman in biology and pre-optometry, said the campout was fun. "It's cool and kind of different," Heine said.

Alford said her team was concentrating on two things. "Sunbathing and kicking back,"

Alford said.

Phi Delta Theta member Ben Simmons, freshman in pre-dentistry, said the campout really showed the support for the basketball team.

"K-State's overall support for the athletic department is really improving," Simmons said. "It's really starting to show."

Simmons said Phi Deltas signed up for three-hour blocks, but Sam Felsenfeld, sophomore in print journalism, said the system was a little unfair.

"Some people get stuck with more shifts than others," Felsenfeld said.

The new system for the campout was published the day the campout started, instead of making fans wait each day for the flag to go up outside Ahearn to signify the beginning.

Norman said he liked the new approach.

"It's a lot better for us," Norman said. "We didn't have the manpower to keep people at Ahearn looking for the flag. This really increases our chances for getting better seats."

Alford said she would probably lose it if her team drew the No. 1 spot in the lottery for seats.

"I'd jump up and down," she said. "Then I'd take the tickets and run."

► NOTRE DAME FOOTBALL

Holtz not giving up

Associated Press

SOUTH BEND, Ind. — Notre Dame coach Lou Holtz has something to say to anyone who started making a list of possible successors when he had spinal surgery last month.

Save it — he's not going anywhere.

"The way I feel right now, I will stay in coaching. Period," Holtz said. "I'm a coach, and that's what I want to do, and there's nothing out there that attracts me more than coaching does. I have every intention of coming back to Notre Dame next year."

It's been one month since surgeons at the Mayo Clinic removed a bulging disk in Holtz's neck that was compressing his spinal cord and causing weakness in his arms and legs. If left untreated, the condition could have left Holtz paralyzed.

Doctors said Holtz wouldn't be able to coach for at least three to four weeks after the Sept. 12 surgery, but he was back on the practice field six days later. He was pacing the sidelines Sept. 30 at Ohio State but felt so lousy afterward he returned to the press box for last weekend's game at Washington.

He will be in the press box again Saturday at Army. Holtz said Tuesday he considered taking the rest of the season off to recuperate, but it was a fleeting thought.

It wasn't that he didn't trust interim coach Bob Davie, Holtz said. Davie, the Irish defensive coordinator, led Notre Dame to a 41-0 rout over Vanderbilt in Holtz's absence.

But Notre Dame had gotten off to a pretty rocky start, losing to Northwestern in its home opener, and there were three back-to-back games against ranked opponents coming up.

"A lot of people say, 'You're crazy to come back.' But had we won our opening ballgame, had we been on a high, I maybe would not have even come back this year," Holtz said. "I just wanted to be with these guys, whether it was good or bad, but be with them because I thought that was what was important right now."

Before the season started, the usually dour Holtz said he planned to have fun this year, no matter what happened. The poor start and his medical problems have tested that resolve, Holtz said.

"What was it they said, 'You want to see God laugh? Tell him the plans you have for the future,'" Holtz said with a laugh. "That's sort of the way I feel this year. I had all these plans."

His medical problems would be the perfect excuse if Holtz wanted to retire. But Holtz said he won't duck his responsibilities just because things aren't going the way he had hoped.

Besides, Holtz said, he can't remember the last time he's felt this good. And at 58, he's still pretty young.

"The worst thing in the world is to run away from something," Holtz said.

"When you retire is when you want to run to something. You get away from coaching because you want to go do something else more. I love coaching, and I enjoy coaching, and there's nothing I would rather do other than that."

► KU FOOTBALL PLAYERS SUSPENDED

LAWRENCE — Two freshmen football players at the University of Kansas have been suspended indefinitely, coach Glen Mason announced.

The two players, Dion Johnson and Elliott Shaffer, both 18, will not participate in games or practices, Mason said Monday.

The two are linemen from Detroit. Both were arrested Monday after returning from a weekend visit to their homes. Neither has played this season.

The players allegedly robbed a taxi driver of $20 Monday morning after he drove them to campus from Kansas City International Airport, police Sgt. Rose Rozniarek said Tuesday.

They were booked into Douglas County Jail on suspicion of aggravated robbery and theft of services. Formal charges were not immediately filed.

Balls, bags 'n' bowling

by Shana Newell

On any given weekend evening, families and friends gather at the local bowling alley to have a drink, eat some chips and bowl a few games. Some bring their special bowling shoes and their lucky purple ball nestled deep in a matching bag. Others prefer to borrow equipment from the alley, usually at a nominal fee. And then there are those who prefer to just kick back and relax while watching others attempt to make strikes and spares and avoid those gutters.

"My friends and I go bowling before we go out," Nicole Hanson, freshman in elementary education, said. "It's fun, and it's not too expensive."

However they choose to participate, many people around Manhattan, including K-State students, have several options when it comes to the sport.

There are leagues, tournaments and special rates available to anyone who is interested.

"Just come on in and sign up," said Todd Stephenson, senior in finance and student worker at the K-State Student Union Recreation Area.

There are two centers from which students can choose. The K-State Student Union has 16 lanes available, and Memory Lanes has 32.

The cost for a game of bowling per person is less than the cost of a movie and much more interactive.

At the K-State Rec Area, the rates depend on whether the person is a student and when they plan to bowl.

During the week, Monday through Thursday until 6 p.m., students can bowl for $1.10 per game, non-students for $1.25 per game. On Fridays, all evenings and during the weekend, the cost for students is $1.40 per game, and non-students are charged $1.55 per game.

For anyone who does not own their own pair of shoes, as is the case with many recreational bowlers, they can be rented for 56 cents a pair.

"I like to bowl at the Union because it doesn't cost very much and because it's central to everything on campus," Tiffani McGonigle, sophomore in secondary education, said. "It's really easy for my friends and I to get together there."

The K-State Union Rec Area has a Saturday rent-a-lane special that runs from 9 a.m. until noon.

"For $3.25 an hour, guests can bowl as many games with as many people as they choose," Stephenson said.

Another popular place for bowlers to test their skills is Memory Lanes. There, the rates are a bit more expensive than at the Union, but patrons get more for their money.

In addition to the 32 lanes available, there is a snack bar and a lounge downstairs from the alley.

"Depending on the size of the group, I'll sometimes stay open later if a group comes in at the last minute," George Easton, general manager of Memory Lanes, said.

To bowl at Memory Lanes, it will cost bowlers $2 per game, per person. Shoe rental is $1.

Memory Lanes also offers bowling specials for its customers.

"Saturday evenings, bowlers can bowl by the hour for $6 each hour," Easton said. "It does not matter how many people or how many games are played."

Sunday mornings bowlers are only charged $5 an hour, and the same criteria applies at that time also.

The current owners have owned the center for only two years, but the alley has been in Manhattan for 36 years, Easton said.

He said that because of the many bowling tournaments that are coming to Memory Lanes, the company is in the process of expansion.

For both centers, hours are varied.

At the Union, bowling is available Monday through Thursday, 8 a.m. until 10:30 p.m. The alley is open Friday from 8 a.m. to 1 a.m., Saturday from 9 a.m. to 1 a.m. and Sunday from noon to 10:30 p.m.

Memory Lanes is open Monday and Fridays from 3 p.m. to midnight. Saturdays and Sundays it is open from 9 a.m. to midnight. Tuesdays it is open from noon to 11 p.m. and Wednesdays and Thursdays from 9 a.m. to 11 p.m.

Some weekends and mornings might be a little more crowded for visitors because of tournaments Memory Lanes sponsors or youth programs, Easton said.

For people who are interested in an on-going participation in bowling, leagues are available. Mixed, Ladies' Only, and Men's Only are all offered at both centers.

"Most people are under the misconception that you have to be a good bowler in order to be in a league," Easton said. "That's just not true."

Memory Lanes offers beginner leagues and scratch leagues, and most of the groups have handicaps, he said.

To enter a league or obtain information, contact anyone at Memory Lanes or John Garison, assistant manager of Union Recreation Area, to sign up.

The Union will offer a league each semester, beginning the first or second week, Stephenson said. Memory Lanes offers leagues at any given time, and their rates are dependent on each individual league association.

"The average is $7 for three games, which includes a prize fund, fees for the association, and charges at the center," Easton said. "It just depends on the league."

Bowling takes on a new dimension

Dana Harding
staff reporter

One campus group has added a new twist to the sport of bowling. They call it pavement bowling.

A group called the Garage Pirate Bowling Association gathers each Saturday morning in search of local garage sales. Their prized possessions are used, cheap bowling balls for bowling on the street.

Pavement bowling is the same as 10-pin bowling, except it takes place on a paved surface outside. The equipment includes a nine to 16-pound standard bowling ball and 10 standard bowling pins.

The object of pavement bowling is to knock down all 10 pins, but the bowler bowls until all 10 pins are down. The length of the lane is up to the bowler but must be longer than 10 feet.

There is a variation in lane width and the pins are set to fellow contestants preference. In pavement bowling, showmanship is valued and competitiveness is discouraged.

Matthew Coolon, senior in elementary education, said the group came across the idea for pavement bowling after attending their first garage sale this past summer.

"Midway through the summer, we found a place selling bowling pins, and we found a bowling ball at a garage sale. We have been garage-saling every weekend since," he said.

Chris Welchans, junior in geography and parks resource management, said pavement bowling is something crazy and entertaining to do. It is more fun than just bowling.

Additional information about the sport and membership information can be found on the Internet at (<http://www.cis.ksu.edu/~mhenley/GPBA/GPBA.html>).

Buying own balls, shoes can cost

Shana Newell
staff writer

Tired of renting shoes at the bowling alley, or borrowing nicked balls that curve uncontrollably? Then purchase equipment made especially designed for the individual bowler.

For those who do not know where to start, a pro shop in a bowling alley would be the first stopping point — and for many, the last.

According to George Easton, general manager of Memory Lanes, quality remains relatively the same across the board from brand to brand.

Prospective buyers have the standard AMF and Brunswick equipment to choose from. However, in recent years, other companies have begun to promote their products, such as Columbia and Ebonite.

"Most people choose their equipment for their aesthetic value," Easton said. "Here in Manhattan, they get the purple ball, the purple shoes."

Beyond that, buyers look for balls that fit specifically for their hands. Often, that depends on who drills the holes in the ball.

"If it is too tight or too loose, it's not going to feel good," Easton said.

The weight of a ball also can affect a bowler's game. If it is too heavy, they might not be able to produce the speed and power they need. If the ball is too light, the bowler will lose control of the ball. Many people today look for resin-reactive balls, Easton said.

"The technology involving bowling balls has advanced tremendously, and people are looking for the best," he said.

In order to outfit themselves with new equipment, including a ball, shoes and ball bag, buyers should look at spending around $150. This will depend on the equipment purchased, however. Some balls can cost more than $200.

Thank goodness they didn't bring Pearl Jam

The Soul Asylum/Matthew Sweet concert on Oct. 2 was an estimated $40,000 loss for Union Programming Council because of low attendance at the show. UPC president Patrick Carney said UPC has since canceled plans to book a similar alternative-rock concert in the spring. Some K-State alternative-rock fans had a prayer service to thank God that such not-so-alternative acts as Gin Blossoms, Spin Doctors and Alanis Morissette weren't booked to play in Bramlage Coliseum.

Ah, that wacky, wild world of editing

The Collegian ran a story Tuesday that erroneously reported students had staged a celebration of the independence of Taiwan, a province of China that has never declared its independence from mainland China and possibly never will. The story drew much criticism and the Collegian ran a correction the next day. Collegian editors have since decided not to refer to Northern Ireland as an "occupied territory" or call the state of Texas "the Lone Star Republic."

The Flat Earth Society's headquarters burned to the ground a few weeks ago, according to the Los Angeles Daily News. The Flat Earth Society, whose members believe the Earth is flat and all evidence to the contrary is part of a conspiratorial hoax, is said to be encouraging investigators to look into whether monsters from the edge of the world set the headquarters ablaze.

The Muppets take Hormel

A federal judge in New York recently ruled the upcoming Muppets movie character Sp'Am doesn't have to have its name changed. Hormel Foods Corporation filed the suit because the corporation said it believed moviegoers would confuse the puppet with their mysterious dietary concoction SPAM. In other news, some pigs in Iowa are considering filing a lawsuit against Hormel because they fear consumers may confuse SPAM with real pork.

O.J. Simpson canceled an interview with the news program "Dateline NBC" Wednesday afternoon just hours before it was to have been taped. NBC's Tom Brokaw said Simpson's lawyers feared some of the questions would provoke answers that could be used against Simpson in the wrongful death civil suits he still faces. Smatterings believes these questions include "Did you kill Ron Goldman and Nicole Brown?" and "Do you usually put on latex gloves before trying on a pair of leather gloves to see if they fit?"

Iraq tells lie to U.N., increases missiles

Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — Iraq tested toxins on animals and misled United Nations monitors on the wide scope of its weapons programs, the chief U.N. weapons inspector said in a report Wednesday.

"Iraq's efforts to conceal its biological weapons program, its chemical missile warhead flight tests and work on the development of a missile for the delivery of a nuclear device led it to provide incorrect information concerning certain of its missile activities," Rolf Ekeus said.

The U.N. imposed economic sanctions after Iraq's 1990 invasion of Kuwait. Security Council members have repeatedly said they will not consider easing the sanctions until Baghdad fully cooperates with the weapons monitors.

"The report makes clear the vast deception effort that Iraq promulgated and shows how difficult it will be to establish compliance on Security Council resolutions on weapons of mass destruction," James P. Rubin, a spokesman for the U.S. mission, said.

"Clearly, Iraq has a long, long, long way to go," he said.

Iraq tested its biological toxins on animals, including sheep, donkeys, monkeys and dogs, the report said.

In 1988 and 1989, Iraq tested bombs and rocket shells loaded with botulism, the carcinogen aflatoxin and subtilis, which was used to simulate anthrax.

Following Iraq's 1990 invasion of Kuwait, Iraq intensified its production of botulism and anthrax and tested a spray tank that could be hooked up to aircraft and used to spray 500 gallons of anthrax over a target, the report said.

The "authority to launch biological and chemical warheads was pre-delegated in the event that Baghdad was hit by nuclear weapons during the Gulf War," the report said.

Iraq flight-tested chemical warheads and had designs for a missile that could reach targets as far as 2,000 miles away, the report said.

Ekeus said Iraq inflated the number of missiles and missile parts it destroyed as part of the monitoring program to hide its research and missile testing.

He also said an Iraqi report to the monitors on Baghdad's biological weapons program, which Iraq earlier said was limited to defensive research, was essentially false.

Iraq claims to have destroyed its toxins in 1991 after the Gulf War. But the U.N. report said the order was given verbally.

"No Iraqi representative seems to be able to recall an exact date for the order or the dates of the destruction operations," the report said.

In August, Iraq admitted it had 199 missiles and bombs tipped with germ warfare agents and a crash program to make a nuclear weapon.

It is in Iraq's best interests to provide everything now, rather than to drag out the uncovering of information which would have increasingly negative effects, Ekeus' report said.

Iraq has agreed to cooperate further with the inspectors, and Ekeus is demanding that Iraq hand over all relevant documents, including material from the defense ministry that monitors believe Iraq is still concealing.

Weapons monitors already have 680,000 pages of documents Iraq handed over following the August defection of its weapons chief, Lt. Gen. Hussein Kamel al-Majid.

Iraqi U.N. Ambassador Nizar Hamdoun was not available for comment Wednesday night, an official at the Iraqi mission said.

THAILAND

Snakes wreak havoc in city

Associated Press

BANGKOK, Thailand — First it was crocodiles. Now it's pythons.

The big snakes are the latest jungle creatures to be swept into Thai streets by monsoon floods.

Almost 100 pythons — which squeeze their prey to death — have been captured during the past three weeks around Bangkok, said Alongkorn Mahannop, director of the Dusit Zoo.

"Usually, they live in their holes under the ground, eat rats, chickens, cats or dogs," Alongkorn said. "The big ones can eat people."

But flooding caused by heavy monsoon rains has flushed the pythons out of their holes and slithering into the city.

"We have got many calls, at least seven people a day, asking us to help capture the snakes," Alongkorn said.

He said the longest python captured so far was about 10 feet. Captured snakes are kept at the zoo until they can be released in national parks.

There have been a few cases of python bites, Alongkorn said. Though the snakes are not poisonous, it is possible to contract tetanus or other infections from a python bite, he said.

Bangkok residents already fear what the tide might bring. Newspapers have been filled with reports that hundreds of crocodiles freed from their pens in farms in the north might have swum into Bangkok along the Chao Phraya River.

CANDIDATE ROUNDUP

Dole promises vote on term limits early next year

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole is dueling with GOP presidential rivals about his postponement of a vote on congressional term limits, a key component of the GOP "Contract With America."

Multimillionaire publishing magnate Steve Forbes faults Dole for shelving next week's vote in a new TV commercial, saying "Senator Dole is wrong. Term limits will help restore honesty to Washington."

The ad is airing nationally on CNN and other cable networks and in local markets, including New Hampshire, said Forbes spokesman John Preyer.

Former Tennessee Gov. Lamar Alexander also said last week that Dole had an obligation to hold a vote this year as he promised.

Dole's team protested Wednesday that he put off the vote at the behest of term-limits organizations and some Senate supporters, who wanted to delay a vote until April. The campaign released letters to Dole from term-limit advocates seeking the delay, and a letter from Americans Back in Charge leader Cleta Mitchell asking Forbes to cancel his ad.

Term limits backers were worried the legislation would be overshadowed by other congressional business and did not have enough support to pass now.

Dole, in a letter Wednesday to Sen. Fred Thompson, R-Tenn., and eight colleagues, promised a vote sometime early next year.

Not to be outdone by other candidates in an early TV ad battle, multimillionaire presidential contender Morry Taylor is going national with his own commercials.

In a bid to establish himself as a Republican party leader, the little-known Illinois wheel manufacturer aims a new commercial at Ross Perot and his plans for a new party.

"Ross Perot agrees with me that our government's a mess, and we agree on how to fix it," Taylor said in the 30-second spot.

"But, Ross, if you really want to help our country, then you and your supporters join me in the Republican Party, where we can win.

"A third party just guarantees us one thing — four more years of Bill Clinton."

The ad is airing on CNN, CNN's "Headline News" and CNBC for the next two weeks, aides said.

So far, Taylor has spent about $3 million of his own fortune, including about $600,000 for radio and TV ads that have run in Iowa, New Hampshire and Maine, said campaign manager Bill Kenyon.

KANSAS STATE BASKETBALL

Free Parking, Free Admission, Doors open at 10 O'Clock.

Miss Manhattan/K-State contestant Stacey Day, junior in dietetics and pre-optometry, and other contestants practice a routine Wednesday afternoon in Manhattan Town Center.

Pageant a predicted success

James Dierking
staff reporter

The lights will shine on seven young women from K-State Saturday night as they compete for the Miss Manhattan/K-State crown.

The winner will receive a $1,000 scholarship, advance to the Miss Kansas America pageant in June and possibly advance to Miss America.

"The focus of Miss America is more the well-rounded individual due to the talent competition, private interviews and platform issue," Susie Stanfield, executive director of the Miss Manhattan/K-State pageant said. "Also, Miss America is for scholarships, not money awards."

Three runners-up will receive smaller scholarships. All scholarship money was donated from local businesses, Stanfield said.

"We're fortunate that, unlike a lot of local pageants, we do not have to raise scholarship money," she said.

Pageant organizers are pleased with the progress of this year's pageant and are ahead of schedule compared to last year, Stanfield said.

Contestants have been attending rehearsals throughout the past week.

"Rehearsals are going well, and we have a lot of really talented girls," Alicia Shaneyfelt, senior in theater and contestant, said.

Some contestants have participated in other pageants, but this will be the first for three of them.

"I'm a little nervous because it's my first time, but I'm looking forward to it," Heidi Bates, junior in dietetics, said. "I'm going into this with the attitude of having fun and meeting a lot of new people."

The competition is also a learning experience and helps prepare contestants for future situations.

Shaneyfelt has been competing in the Miss Manhattan/K-State pageant since 1993.

"It's a wonderful organization. I remember when I first got into the pageant, and I've changed a lot since then," she said.

"I feel more mature as a person and can go into a situation and not feel scared at all," Shaneyfelt said.

Contestants for Miss Manhattan/K-State must be 18 to 24, never married or pregnant, and a resident of Manhattan or a college student in Manhattan.

The swimsuit competition will have a different twist.

"We are the first local pageant in Kansas to have barefoot swimsuit competition," she said.

Most of the contestants became interested through word of mouth or other pageants.

"This year we also ran an ad in the Collegian and were flooded with phone calls. Most of the girls responded because of the need for scholarship money," Stanfield said.

The pageant will be at 7 p.m. Saturday at the Wareham Opera House. Tickets will be sold at the door and are $8 for adults and $4 for children 12 and under.

Students allowed to evaluate advisers, express opinions in new survey

Survey to check satisfaction level of students

Chris May
staff reporter

The Arts and Sciences Council is giving students a chance to evaluate their advisers.

"We're trying to find out if students are happy with their advisers and what we can do to improve the advising process," said Jason Oblander, senior in history and chairman of the College of Arts and Sciences Survey Committee.

Surveys will be handed out to all arts and sciences students when they pick up their enrollment sheets. Students then have the opportunity to fill them out and return them either to the dean's office or at Willard Hall during enrollment, Oblander said.

"We are working on getting a drop box in Willard so it would be really convenient for students," said Amy Donahy, sophomore in pre-med and member of the council committee.

The council is not surveying students because of complaints received.

"We're not saying that the advising now is poor — we just want to get input from students to see if they're satisfied," Donahy said.

However, complaints received from students were taken into consideration Oblander said.

"You always have some complaints," Oblander said. "We just want to see if they are valid."

The survey consists of seven questions about how advisers worked with their students, advisers informing students on their requirements, how accessible the advisers are and whether the advisers told students about available resources on campus will also be questions on the survey, Oblander said.

Advising is the only focus of this survey. A comprehensive survey was conducted two years ago, and results showed that students felt there was a problem with advising, Donahy said.

In addition, the council will be reviewing departments in the College of Arts and Sciences. They will be evaluating the mathematics, physics and English departments. But those projects will be entirely separate from the advising survey, said Kristin McDonald, sophomore in pre-health and council committee member.

"We want to find out what students are concerned with and initiate projects for the Arts and Sciences Council," Donahy said.

It is important for students to fill out the adviser surveys to improve the advising process, Oblander said.

"The purpose is to find out how satisfied the students are within the college with their advisers," McDonald said. "We don't want it to look like we're attacking the advisers. We just want to find out how the students feel."

against people engaged in verbal harassment in a public forum, she said.

During public forums, it would be difficult to sue harassers because of their First Amendment right to say almost anything, but people making harmful discriminatory remarks should be asked why homosexual issues bother them, Smith said.

"I don't think you'll ever convince them that they're wrong, but you deserve respect," she said.

When harassment happens over the phone, people should try to identify the caller, Smith said.

"Verbal harassment is phone harassment and can be criminally charged," she said. "I could never tell who was calling me until I got caller ID."

Freedom of the press and freedom of speech conflict because newspapers can decide whether to run advertisements, Smith said.

"It's difficult to take a stand against them. Newspapers may prevail in this instance," she said.

Non-discrimination policies are also prominent in the military, including ROTC.

Discrimination is possible within the military's "Don't ask, don't tell" arena, she said.

Greeks are also exempt to non-discrimination policy, she said.

"Students can only raise their voices at this policy," Smith said.

With the K-State non-discrimination policy, people can claim things as long as the lies are generalized, Smith said.

If somebody directly discriminates a specific individual and causes harm to their reputation they are considered defamed and can sue, she said.

"Certainly, the law is part of American culture," she said. "It mirrors what American culture is — for the most part, it means Anglo-Saxon."

Gay, lesbian and bisexual groups should be allowed to exist, even with a conservative legislature, she said.

Mary Renee Smith, freshman in public relations, said K-State has prejudice.

"I think it's a traditionally conservative campus, and that is why there is a little more prejudice," Mary Renee Smith said.

Mary Renee Smith has attended at least one event each day of the GLB week-long celebration in order to show her pride, she said.

It is important for others to show their courage as well by taking the front door to these types of functions and not the back, she said.

Darrin Pfannenstiel, second-year Washburn law student, said it concerns him when people, and more specifically media, point homosexuals and bisexuals out and treat them differently.

"Any group trying to pick itself up by the bootstraps wouldn't expect to have antithetical views or pieces opposing their very essence," Pfannenstiel said.

LIBRARY

"We feel this project is an excellent project to use the sales-tax revenue to benefit both communities," said Fred Atchison, director of Manhattan Public Library. "K-State students use Manhattan Public Library a lot."

"Usage by full-time K-State students is easily 25 percent of our patron base of 44,000," he said. "If you consider in the part-time students, that percentage will increase even more."

Atchison said the cost estimate to provide the infrastructure of hardware, installation and access to the Internet and databases are about $8,000.

Manhattan Public Library provides service to people living in 12 surrounding counties.

"To get a user's card, you only need a photo ID and a proof of address," said Eric Matthews, circulation desk employee at Manhattan Public Library. "The first card is free, and if you lose it, replacement IDs cost a dollar."

The policy at Farrell is different. K-State students, faculty or staff can borrow items simply with their K-State IDs, but a borrower's card must be issued if the person is not affiliated with K-State.

"We issue borrower's cards to anyone with a Kansas driver's license," Hobrock said. "But, if you aren't part of K-State, the borrower's card will cost $10."

"It will be convenient for non-students to be able to access our resources here at Farrell," Cole said. "And they can come and research any materials here as much as they want."

"But if they want to check them out, they'll have to pay $10 for a borrower's card."

Hobrock said Farrell is upgrading and improving its computer databases to allow the library user the ability to access most databases from one terminal.

A library user will not have to go from one computer station to a different computer station to access different databases. Instead, information will be provided on the same terminal.

"We will call the new system simply the Library System," Hobrock said. "It will operate on UNIX instead of the KSU mainframe, which we are currently on."

Hobrock said he hopes to have the Library System and other updated services available by the end of the semester.

"While we have access to all Regents libraries, it's kind of clumsy to go in and out of their different files," Hobrock said. "The upgrades will allow us to conduct a search for all libraries at the same time."

Atchison said the project is a great opportunity for the Manhattan Public Library.

"The technical expertise of people from K-State Libraries and Computer Networking Services is an immense benefit to us," he said.

AIDS

Researcher develops, tests AIDS hybrid

Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A University of Kansas scientist said he has developed a hybrid of the AIDS virus and is testing it on monkeys in the hope of speeding the development of a vaccine for the deadly disease.

Bill Narayan, a virologist at the University of Kansas Medical Center, said the virus, a cross between simian AIDS and human AIDS viruses, has in six months caused the same degree of illness in the monkeys that it takes humans 10 years to develop.

Vaccine research had been slowed because HIV, the human AIDS virus, has not caused monkeys to become sick with AIDS. However, monkeys can develop the disease from the simian immunodeficiency virus, or SIV, which is similar to HIV.

Narayan used a virus developed by Harvard researchers that combines parts of HIV with SIV. He then increased the strength of the hybrid virus by passing it from monkey to monkey through bone-marrow transplants.

"Nobody's ever done what we have done," Narayan said. "They have put the virus in a monkey and waited around."

Other scientists said several labs are moving quickly to develop the disease in monkeys with hybrid strains of the virus. Some question whether the focus of Narayan's work holds much promise for finding a vaccine.

Within six months of being infected with the new virus, about 20 monkeys developed many of the symptoms seen in humans. Three monkeys have died so far of AIDS-related causes, and four others are severely ill.

The findings will allow researchers to begin testing vaccines immediately, Narayan said Wednesday at his laboratory.

"The monkey provides you with data that you didn't have before — that you could not have access to," Narayan said. His lab will receive 25 monkeys this week to begin vaccine tests.

Dr. Anthony Fauci, director of the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases, said the new virus is a significant finding.

"We have been trying for so many years to find an animal model for HIV," he said. "This model will accelerate research."

The National Institutes of Health has given Narayan a four-year, $1.6-million grant to continue his work.

Dr. Norman Letvin, who helped develop the hybrid virus that Narayan started with, described the work as a technical step, not a breakthrough, and said Narayan's is one of several laboratories making monkeys sick with the virus.

Letvin said it was premature to discuss Narayan's work because review by other scientists has not been completed.

here at K-State."

After working in Tennessee for a full week, Riley noticed a lot of similarities between Tennessee and K-State.

Riley said he has noticed the friendliness of students at both universities is similar.

At K-State, Riley also served as an adviser for the Agricultural Student Council, which Mugler said is an effective organization on campus.

"I'll miss the close contact with the students, as well as the alumni relationship with former students," Riley said. "K-State has a very good program in agriculture and is a good university. I'm moving to a school that possesses those same qualities."

Before leaving, Riley said he wishes K-State students his best.

He also said students should take advantage of every opportunity to develop their personal and leadership skills.

Riley's last day in office at K-State will be Oct. 20. A special reception for students and faculty to honor Riley will be on Friday from 3 to 5 p.m. in Waters Hall 117.

"He's a very good person," Chuck Durbin, junior in agricultural business, said. "To me, he has become more of a friend than an administrator."

"He's very goal-oriented. If he says something will be done, it will get done," Durbin said. "K-State will really miss his connections in the working field. It's extremely rare if a student can't find a job and Dr. Riley can't help."

"We, the people of the United Nations, to save future generations from the horrors of war..."

With those words, the department of music and the Flint Hills Chapter of the United Nations Association of the United States presented a tribute to the golden anniversary of the U.N.

Conductor David Littrell walked onto the stage after the spoken word. A hearty applause greeted him. He picked up the wand, and the well-rehearsed orchestra members picked up their instruments.

Cellos and violins were on the left half of the stage, with timpani, piccolo and flute, harp and piano behind them. Violas, cellos and bass were on the right, along with the lower brass instruments.

The middle had oboes, clarinets, bassoons, trumpets and horns.

The first piece was "Overture: The Consecration of the House," written by a completely deaf Ludwig van Beethoven in 1822, five years before his death.

The string section laid down a moderate melody, which was slowly overtaken by the powerful low-brass instruments — the tuba and trombone.

The brass section slowly gained ground throughout the piece, eventually dominating the strings to a final crescendo, ending the song.

After a brief pause and seemingly perpetual applause, Jean Sloop, a 34-year member of the music faculty, walked onto the stage. The applause doubled as the audience recognized this elegant lady.

Henryk Gorecki's "Symphony No. 3" began with a deep, slow groan from the bass. With excellent flow, this musical motif crept to the cellos, where it gained volume. Several minutes later, the violins followed.

Soon, the entire front string sections were sending forth a pervading, emotive aural presentation, a sound-stage tinged with sadness.

The emerging melody was a bouquet of sorrow, the sound of delicate rose petals crushed under the feet of big men with little hearts.

Sloop began her soprano solo, singing the lamentation of the Holy Cross Monastery from "Lysagora Songs" collection, written in the second half of the 15th century.

Though sung entirely in Polish, there was no trouble conveying the dramatic story of a son languishing in a Nazi prison while his mother languished elsewhere.

After the third movement of the song, the string section must have gained some idea of suffering, not only in the music itself, but in the physical exertion required to hold an E note for much of the 15-minute piece.

A thundering reception from the audience and a short intermission introduced the much lighter "Hansel and Gretel" by Engelbert Humperdinck.

A bold song with a light mood, this song exhibited the climbing tones of the horns and the dynamic, low-brass punch of the tuba and trombones.

The final selection was "Finlandia," composed by Sibelius in 1899 as a protest against Russian influence in Finland. The piece perfectly utilized every instrument in Littrell's arsenal: crashing cymbals, tinkling triangles, frolicking flutes and the low blats from the tuba.

The ensemble of the Men's Glee Club sang two stanzas lauding independence and national pride. The piece ended with a tremendous crescendo of the entire orchestra, with that glorious split-second of silence at the end, just before the audience applauded in a final culminating ovation.

ROBOTS

Students win robot competition

Phil Roberts

Staff reporter

Students from the K-State Department of Computing and Information Sciences were awarded third place in this year's Mobile Robot Competition.

The prize-winning Nomad 200 robots stand about two feet high and operate with arms or legs. The robots run by sensory input over a keyboard and a radio link where radio waves are transmitted and received by antennas on the robot.

During the development process, the team members did a lot of paperwork and looked at the other projects to get some basic ideas about the robots. The hardware for the robots was bought and assembled by the team members and, during a semester, the robot's software was developed by the team members.

Doug Chapman and Eric Runquist, graduate students in computer science; Brian VanDoren, junior in computer science; and Pawel Osiczko, senior in computer science, were on the team.

"It was very stressful," VanDoren said. "It was much, much more stressful than I thought school could be."

The competition the Nomad 200s were entered in took more than three days, with preliminary rounds meeting privately.

"This is the first year that we've attended," David A. Gustafson, professor of computing and information sciences, said. "We had a student in it the year before, and he encouraged us to do it."

The final round was for public viewing and featured robots that showed robustness through the preliminary rounds.

"The competition was office navigation," Chapman said. "There were walls like an office and the robot had to take instructions, understand those instructions and be able to execute them. Occasionally, we would give them the wrong instructions and they had to determine that."

The robots were given their instructions on a radio link through sensor input. If teams were able to give their instructions through verbal entry, they received bonus points for the competition.

However, the K-State team experienced problems during the competition, calling for immediate changes that had to be made to place in the contest.

"It was kind of rough,"

VanDoren said. "Things came up that we didn't test for here, like the huge crowds."

The K-State team worked during the night to fix any unforeseen problems, Chapman said.

"With so many other people and other computers in the room, we had a bad connection," Chapman said.

VanDoren said they had to talk to the judges about changing their software. The judges advised the changes would be a good idea for next year.

"We had to tell them, 'No, we plan to do it this evening,'"

VanDoren said.

Since the competition, several other K-State students have shown interest in competing in the future. During the spring Open House, the award-winning robots were on display in Durland Hall. Plans are being made for another competition next August in Portland, Ore.

The fourth annual Mobile Robot Competition was sponsored by the International Joint Conference on Artificial Intelligence and the American Association for Artificial Intelligence.

PAYROLL

"We're emphasizing direct deposit, hoping more and more employees will switch to direct deposit," Schellhardt said.

Employees will be able to have specific amounts of their paychecks directly deposited into a check or savings account, as long as they use the same bank for both accounts, Gerht said.

K-State administrators are working closely with the state of Kansas and the University of Kansas to implement the new system, Schellhardt said.

Schellhardt and other representatives from the University meet each week with representatives from the state and KU to discuss the implementation of the new system.

The state has contracted Anderson Consultants to help implement the system statewide, he said.

"This is the first time we have worked together on a major project with the state and KU to benefit all of us," Schellhardt said.

Work on the project began in May 1994 and was divided into three phases. The first phase included reviewing the way payroll was done now and how the University would like it to be done.

The second phase was implementing the system.

The final phase, which is scheduled for completion Jan. 12, will make sure all managers are able to acquire management reports.

The change in payroll system is due to the fair labor and standards act passed by the Kansas legislature last year, Gerht said.

Kansas has five different pay systems, and it needed to organize one pay period for everyone. The state thought the biweekly pay system will be best for everyone, Schellhardt said.

"The major reason for the change is all of our old payroll systems are poor," Schellhardt said.

HRIS allows department supervisors to enter the hours worked by each employee within the first two working days after the end of a pay period. Then data will be sent to a main computer and transferred to Topeka. From Topeka, paychecks will be sent to full-time employees' homes. Hourly student employees will be required to pick up paychecks at their departments, Schellhardt said.

"It will be important for all employees to turn in their leave and time worked on time," Gerht said.

Response from faculty has been mostly positive because employees are anxious to be paid more often, Gerht said.

Some employees, however, are worried about adjusting their budgets to pay bills at the end of the month, she said.

K-State will sponsor informative sessions given by Consumer Credit Counseling, of Manhattan, to help employees budget money on a biweekly basis.

"They will have to change the whole thought process from getting paid monthly to biweekly," Gerht said.

Schellhardt said articles concerning the transition have been sent to faculty and employees and the dates of the informative sessions will be announced to employees.

Cheryl Martin, senior in social work and criminal justice, encourages students to sign a petition at the table behind her, where her husband, Rick, sophomore in criminal justice, works Thursday afternoon at the free-speech zone near the K-State Student Union. The two were collecting signatures for a petition to include child day care at the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex.

The question of day care

■ Rec complex day care services goal of student petition

Nate Shilling
staff reporter

More than 400 signatures have been gathered for a petition to include a day-care center at the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex.

Five social work students began the effort to include a day care at the Rec Complex as part of a Social Work Practice 3 assignment. The students have gathered a total of 295 letters and 446 signatures in support for the day-care center, Cheryl Martin, senior in social work, said.

"Sixty and a half dollars of each student's tuition goes toward funding the Rec Complex. There is equal opportunity for each student to use the rec, except for those who are parents of children," Martin said. "All students enrolled at K-State should have the opportunity to be able to use the facilities."

After working on the class project, the idea of adding a day-care center became a personal project.

"Since we first began, this issue has really become our main interest," Michelle Mace, senior in social work, said.

Martin said many proposals for a day-care center at the Rec Complex have been previously proposed, but the Rec Complex Services Council has voted against all of them. The support they are receiving now on the petition is much larger than they had expected.

"Last year, a petition of around 600 names supporting the same issue was presented to the Rec Complex Services Council," Martin said. "But it was decided that no need existed for such programs. We are currently receiving much more support now, and I think something needs to happen."

Raydon Robel, Director of Recreational Services, said another proposal was presented last year for day care and was turned down.

"The Services Council decided, following a presentation on the day-care issue, that there was no need for a day-care center at the rec, and that the issue should be left to other agencies outside of the Rec Complex," Robel said.

"Surveys were conducted at other Big 8 schools, but all of the extra costs, procedures, etc., left the issue out of the picture. The Services council must look in the interest of money being well spent," he said.

Although some proposals included cost assessment per user of such a program, the surveys conducted at other schools all noted the need for additional subsidies, Robel said.

Despite the issue of cost, the Social Work Practice 3 students, and the other supporters of the policy said they feel a day-care center is an issue of responsibility.

"I'm very shocked that students, especially education majors, are not concerned with this issue that includes children's health," Martin said. "This issue not only affects the parents, but with a day-care program at the Rec Complex, children could also learn about health. We need to be setting an example for children to lead healthy lives."

Robel said he felt there were options other than the Rec Complex providing day care.

"There are other agencies available in town for these kinds of services," Robel said. "But probably the easiest alternative would be to find other parents with similar situations and work out a cooperative with each other."

Oktoberfest coming to Aggieville

Chad Moreland
staff reporter

Aggieville is gearing up to transform itself into an old German village full of German crafts, entertainment and delicious foods.

The Aggieville Business Association will sponsor the 15th annual Oktoberfest Food and Craft Fair from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Saturday.

"This is a quality community event that gets people into Aggieville and allows them to see what we have to offer," Cheryl Sieben, president of the Aggieville Business Association, said.

The streets of Aggieville will be filled with unique, talented artists and craftsmakers, who will be displaying their work throughout the day.

"The event gives people the opportunity to showcase some of their talents," Sieben said.

An array of food vendors will also be featured at the event. There will be funnel cakes, fresh baked goods, kettle corn, and sausage. In the tradition of Germany, bratwurst and bierocks will also be served.

A new addition to the Oktoberfest will be live entertainment all day long. There will be a stage with live music, stomp aerobic demonstrations and a performance by the K-State Classy Cats.

Three fashion shows will be featured by Varney's Book Store and Krystallos throughout the day.

"We're trying to attract a wide variety of people," Sieben said. "There will be live bands and activities for the college kids and plenty of entertainment for kids and their parents."

This year's Oktoberfest will feature more activities for children. Activities will include clowns and face painters, pony rides and an exotic petting zoo, Sieben said.

Admission to the Oktoberfest is free, and everyone is welcome.

Christians pray, rejoice at All Faiths

Claudette Riley
staff reporter

Christians crowded into All Faiths Chapel Thursday as they worshipped and sought the heart of God.

Students from various campus groups and Manhattan Christian College prayed, rejoiced and confessed their sins throughout the evening.

Bernard Franklin, assistant dean of Student Life, called for Christians to come out of the closet of anonymity.

"We are going to lay down denominations, lay down organizations, culture, race and color for the glory of God. We're not trying to make something happen. We believe deeply in God and believe he wants to do something in our hearts and minds," Franklin said. "Periodically, God puts people in our midst to nudge us along into his presence, into his awesomeness."

Hearing examples of faith from others strengthens the weak, Franklin said. Three students shared personal testimony of the revival which started last spring at Wheaton College in Chicago.

Randa Saadah, sophomore in Christian education at Wheaton, told students how she surrendered things of this world.

"What I learned is that we have to surrender. We can't hold anything back. I know God is real and he works mightily," Saadah said. "Our faith is real, and it gives us life, even if you don't think of the eternal sense, it's the life given every day."

Don Hay, junior in Christian education at Wheaton, said he felt an amazing awareness of the presence of God.

"Christianity is based on falling in love with Christ. Christ can be experienced as a daily moving on and a daily filling," Hay said.

Revivals happen on campuses when students breath new life into their faith, Hay said.

"I realized that there was a lot of dead stuff in my heart, a lot of stuff I was holding onto," Hay said. "Now, I come to you as a beggar showing you the bread of Christ. Take the bread, eat it and share it with those around you."

Eric Gorman, senior in Christian education at Wheaton, urged students to get right with God.

"We need to take advantage of God's gift of grace. We need to ask God to untangle the sin in our

Million Man March

A day devoted to black men

■ Nation's capital prepares for upcoming event

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — There will be no marching, and no one knows how many men will be here. But the nation's capital is scrambling to get ready for an influx of buses and people for next week's Million Man March.

The Capitol Police urged members of Congress and their staffs to carpool to work on Monday and warned all commuters to expect clogged roads and jammed subways during the all-day event for African American men.

"You've really got to plan for the most; if they say a million, that's what you plan for," U.S. Park Service spokeswoman Sandra Alley said Wednesday. "Realistically, what it's going to be, we don't know yet."

Sam Jordan, director of the city's office of emergency preparedness, said the city is planning for at least 500,000 people to attend.

The event, also called a day of atonement, will bring African American men together for prayer, reflection and inspirational speakers. Organizers have asked African American women to stay home while the men gather to atone for past sins and commit themselves to uplifting their families and communities.

They also will be asked to unite for political strength. But they won't march.

"There's no room for anybody to march anywhere. We named it a march because that's a familiar name," said Abdul Allah Muhammad, a spokesman for march organizers, including Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan.

Organizers predict more than

■ Black Student Union supporting March

Tonya Bobbitt
staff reporter

K-State's Black Student Union is sponsoring voter registration, a rally and other activities Monday to support the nationwide Million Man March.

BSU wanted to do something in honor of the Million Man March, Jawwad Abdulhaqq, sophomore in political science and president of BSU, said.

"It was a collective idea to support the overall march and the whole day," Abdulhaqq said. "We need to keep up with what's going on with our people nationally."

BSU will sponsor voter registration and encourage black students to vote. If black people want their voices to be heard, they need to vote, Abdulhaqq said.

Black students will also have the opportunity to break up into small groups and discuss their concerns about campus and the definition of being black, said Gemini Pankey, sophomore in speech and marketing and vice president of BSU.

They will also have a chance to discuss how to address their concerns and find solutions to their problems.

While in small groups, they will make short lists of concerns and solutions. They will then combine them into one larger list.

A rally is also planned Monday to inform the black students about the Million Man March and its purpose. And the day will end with a candle-light vigil. The time and place for the rally was passed around by word of mouth only, Pankey said.

LAFENE SURVEY TO BE CONDUCTED DURING LAST WEEK OF OCTOBER

A student survey concerning the financial situation of Lafene Health Center will be conducted during the last week of October.

The survey, which will list three separate plans concerning the future of student user fees, will be conducted by the Student Health Advisory Committee.

The in-house surveys will be attached to patient satisfaction surveys, which are scheduled to be released during the last for three days of October, Lannie Zweimiller, director of Lafene, said.

In the past, 1,200 patient surveys have been distributed with a 75-percent return rate, Zweimiller said.

The results of the student survey will be used as options for recommendations to the Student Governing Association regarding the proposed reduced student health fees.

The SHAC privilege fee sub-committee will meet at 8:30 a.m. Oct. 17 in Zweimiller's office to discuss final details of the student survey.

SAINT MARY AND MEMORIAL HOSPITALS FINALIZING MERGER DETAILS

The Saint Mary and Memorial hospitals are finalizing details of the merger between the two hospitals.

Mike Nunamaker, chief executive officer of Memorial Hospital, said the hospitals are still trying to work out important issues of the merger.

"But we are not at the point to make a public statement regarding the details," Nunamaker said.

Both parties are optimistic about what the merger will bring to the community and the surrounding areas.

"We have made major strides in getting all the details solidified. We are both very optimistic, the talks are progressing extremely well. The spirit of cooperation and the intent to make this happen is strong because it will improve the health care in Manhattan and surrounding areas," said J.H. Seitz, president and chief executive officer of Saint Mary Hospital.

FBI ASSISTING ATTORNEY GENERAL IN PITTSBURG STATE INVESTIGATION

TOPEKA (AP) — The FBI is helping Attorney General Carla Stovall with an investigation of the former president of Pittsburg State University.

The Kansas Bureau of Investigation has examined the fund-raising activities of Donald Wilson for more than five months. Wilson resigned in April as PSU president under pressure from the Kansas Board of Regents.

The investigation centers on Wilson's fund-raising activities on behalf of a pet project, creation of the International University of Thailand. Wilson has said he did nothing wrong.

Stovall would not discuss the contents of a KBI report submitted to her earlier this week. She confirmed the FBI's involvement on Thursday.

"I wouldn't be wasting KBI resources or FBI resources if I didn't think there was a reason to pursue the investigation," she said.

Stovall said she asked the FBI for help in obtaining evidence located in foreign countries. She said she is seeking critical financial information.

Stovall said the KBI conducted dozens of interviews and reviewed hundreds of financial documents from across the United States.

SENATOR DOLE SAYS FIGHT NOT OVER FOR WORLD WAR II GENERATION

WASHINGTON (AP) — Fifty years have passed, but the generation that won World War II still has battles to fight, Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., told a joint session of Congress on Wednesday.

Instead of Nazi Germany or expansionist Japan, the foes now are problems such as drug abuse and the federal budget deficit, the Kansas Republican said.

"In looking forward it should become clear to my generation and to all generations that our work is not yet finished and our mission is not yet complete," said Dole, who has often sounded the one more mission theme in his quest for the 1996 GOP presidential nomination.

"We must look ahead to the next 50 years to the ordeals we face now and those yet to come."

The House and Senate met

Wednesday to acknowledge the heroism of those who fought in World War II, which ended just over 50 years ago.

Dole was seriously wounded while fighting in Italy in 1945.

Quoting from former Supreme Court Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Dole said the day commemorated the times when the war generation's hearts were touched by fire and when America saved the world.

Early church open to homosexual lifestyle

Holly McConkey
staff reporter

The essence of the gospels is loving your neighbor, even if they are homosexual, a lecturer for the Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual Week said Thursday.

Denise Leopold, minister at the Metropolitan Community Church of Manhattan and Manhattan AIDS Project board member, spoke about the changing perspective of the church toward homosexual relationships throughout history.

"The early church took seriously the declaration of Christ," she said. "It's not who you loved, not the gender of who you loved but how you loved."

Early church documents show marriage ceremonies were written for same-gender couples and the apostles Philip and Bartholomew were united as partners in a marriage ceremony, she said.

An audience member argued the Philip and Bartholomew Leopold cited might not be the same from the Bible.

"How many Philip and Bartholomews existed in that time?" he said.

The literary evidence that supports the connection is overwhelming, Leopold said.

"All you have to do is dig back in the literature, and you will find the

Scott Curry, a university law school student and first openly gay man to address the Kansas legislature, will present "Proactive Approaches to Religious Radicalism: Defining our own Agendas."

There will be a reception today from 4:30 to 6:30 p.m. at the Ramada Inn for the public to meet the speaker.

truth," she said. "As far as church history wants to admit, it doesn't exist."

All kinds of people lived together in a community, including gays and lesbians, she said. But they did argue, and that is how we have documentation of their existence.

Before the church joined with Rome, the pastors had sex and did all the things normal human beings do, she said.

But afterwards, they began to change their theology. The theologians began to preach abstinence, she said.

Although many churches teach abstinence, they say if you have to give into sex, do it in a marriage. We are all told from growing up that human sexuality can be bad, Leopold said.

"And we wonder why we have hang-ups about sex?," she said.

God gave people the gift of sexuality, she said.

"If you listen to the preachings of Jesus, He teaches us that our human relationships are important. Somehow we forget it is the quality of our relationships and how we treat people that shows God's love," she said.

Bill Smith, president of Flint Hills Alliance, said the speech helped bring a lot of the issues concerning homosexuality and religion to the surface.

"I think it opened up a lot of good points about religion and how we need to accept each other as individuals, not as types of people that others think we should be or want us to be," he said.

Leopold said prejudice is holding people back from seeing the facts for what they are.

Prejudice keeps people holding on to hate and narrow views.

"The only thing I know to do is pray that we can let go of our hate," she said.

Marching bands to perform

Kimberly Kircher
staff reporter

Top high school marching bands from Kansas will perform at Memorial Stadium during the 1995 Central States Marching Festival Saturday.

Performances begin at 12:40 p.m., when the first of 16 high school bands is scheduled to play. Bands will play every 20 minutes throughout the day, and the K-State Marching Band will play at 6:10 p.m. as judges finish rating the bands.

"The festival is not a competition between the bands. Each band is judged individually," Frank Tracz, director of bands, said.

The bands are rated superior, excellent, good or poor according to their performance, he said.

"I am against competition between bands. It is against the music philosophy," Tracz said.

The bands are not out to beat anyone but just to improve, he said.

But the students will compare each other, even if the day is based on a rating system, Ray James, director of bands at Buhler High School, said.

"I think there is an individual competition between the other schools," he said. "The students target the best schools there."

K-State and the high school bands both get positive experiences from the day.

"The top 16 bands in the state will be in our backyard — it is great recruiting," Tracz said.

BAND FESTIVAL

► The Central States Marching Festival will be at Memorial Stadium Saturday, beginning at 12:40 p.m. The K-State Marching Band will perform at 6:10 p.m. K-State students and faculty will be admitted free with a K-State ID. Members of the public will be charged $3.

Good experiences are what brings bands back year after year, James said. The Buhler High School marching band has 180 students in the band.

"We wouldn't come if it wasn't a positive experience for us. That is why we come back," James said.

The students are treated well, the judges give good criticism and the day is a good learning experience, James said.

"We have been coming every other year for as long as I can remember," he said.

The Buhler High School students come to the day hoping to walk away feeling good about what they have done, he said.

"We have stars in our eyes, and we strive for the best," he said.

Jena Pralle, sophomore in music education and cymbal player, said Saturday will be neat because high school students look up to the college students.

"It is a neat feeling being on the other side of the stick," she said. "We are not being judged, but we are on the fun side."

Eric Stambaugh, sophomore in music education and tenor sax player, has been on both sides of the stick.

"The festival helped make my final decision between K-State and Wichita," Stambaugh said.

Professionalism is different between high school and college students, he said.

College students take things more seriously, and high school students are there for an easy 'A,' he said.

"The marching festival is a great opportunity for the bands to compare themselves because when I was in high school I understood what improvements I had to make by looking at the other schools," Stambaugh said.

K-State band members will be busy helping the day run smoothly.

"Throughout the day, the marching band will be working a variety of 150 different jobs," Tracz said. "From ticket sellers to field assistants, from band guides to percussion movers."

The marching band expects to break even as far as the cost goes, Tracz said. University funds are not paying for the festival, he said.

"There is a $75 entry fee for the high school bands," he said.

Money will fund for maintenance at the stadium, a PA system, plaques, airfare for the judges and other projects, Tracz said.

► AMTRAK

FBI broadens search for suspects in derailment

Associated Press

HYDER, Ariz. — The FBI broadened its search Thursday for the saboteur who derailed an Amtrak train, checking tire tracks in the desert several miles away, knocking on doors in the sparsely populated area and interviewing railroad employees.

About 40 of the 90 agents who have been working near the site of Monday's crash fanned out to interview residents and others, said Robert Walsh, the FBI agent running the investigation.

About 20 other agents were sent back to their home offices from the crash scene 55 miles southwest of Phoenix, where Amtrak's Sunset Limited derailed on a sabotaged stretch of track and tumbled into a gulch. One crew member was killed, and at least 78 people were injured.

The saboteur unbolted a bar that holds two rails together, loosened or removed spikes and used a wire to bypass a system intended to warn crews of a break in the track.

Several copies of a letter alluding to the federal sieges at Waco, Texas, and Ruby Ridge, Idaho, and signed "Sons of Gestapo" were found at the scene.

Agents have been given access to Amtrak personnel records and are interviewing employees of the rail company and Southern Pacific Railroad, which owns the track, said Walsh, who heads the FBI's San Diego office.

He cautioned against interpreting that to mean investigators have fixed on the theory the saboteur was a disgruntled railroad employee.

"That would be quite a stretch. If they really wanted to target the railroads, I think that's what they would have focused on more in the letter,"

Walsh said.

Agents also have collected information on anti-government militia groups, he said, again warning against concluding the FBI is leaning toward that theory.

"It's very broad. It's still open to everyone," Walsh said.

Agents even copied the subscriber list of an obscure railroad magazine that published an article detailing a 56-year-old case of track sabotage in Nevada that paralleled the Amtrak case, down to disabling the warning system.

The magazine, Southern Pacific Trainline, which has 30 subscribers in Arizona, and 1,800 total, was put in the mail in Kansas on Oct. 3, less than a week before the wreck.

In the morning agents in vehicles and on foot traveled several miles from the site to a spot where tire tracks were spotted from the air. They returned at midday, and Walsh wouldn't immediately say if they had a solid lead.

Investigators were hampered by temperatures that reached 114 — causing at least one case of dehydration — and the normal hazards of the desert.

"You have to tell them how to avoid rattlesnakes, how to avoid cactus and how to avoid injury," Walsh said.

Attorney General Janet Reno again appealed for public help. The FBI has set up a hot line for receiving tips. She refused to discuss what evidence had been uncovered and said it would be premature to guess the motive for the sabotage.

"Those who perpetrate such incidents must be told loud and clear," Reno said, "that every federal resource will be put to the effort to find and punish them to the full extent of the law."

► UNITED NATIONS

Shutdown possible for UN if nations do not pay dues

Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — U.N. Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali drew a line in the ledgers Thursday and said if member states don't soon pay the $3.7 billion they owe, the United Nations will begin shutting down.

The biggest U.N. debtor is the United States, which owes about $1.4 billion. Seventy countries in all have not paid their regular budget assessments.

The United Nations is prohibited by its own rules from commercial borrowing and relies on contributions from its 185 member states to run its operations.

"There is not enough cash to pay for what we have to do," Boutros-Ghali said in a speech to a Rotary International conference in New York.

"The world's governments spent about $150 per human being on military expenditures in 1992," he said. "Total spending by the United Nations, by comparison, was less than $2 per human being. And now, even that very small amount cannot be maintained."

A hostile, Republican-controlled U.S. Congress has been slow to approve funding for the United Nations and has demanded substantial reforms in its bureaucracy. Reforms have been opposed by many developing countries, partly because their governments do not want to lose highly paid jobs for their nationals.

During a meeting Tuesday, U.N. employees threatened work slowdowns and other job actions to protest planned cutbacks.

in our opinion

Day-care option for Rec requires consideration

What will be an excessive expense is insurance, and that's where parents must shoulder the cost.

It's time to meet the needs of all K-State students.

Supporters of a petition for day care at the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex said they have collected 446 signatures and 295 letters of support so far.

That number is a strong sign that K-Staters want something, and it's time for the Rec Complex Services Council to listen up.

Day care at the Rec is possible. Available room is now certainly possible.

Parent and student volunteers are possible. Donated toys and books are possible.

And if for some reason its users don't want to donate their time and effort to the day care, then getting rid of it is possible.

But it's worth a try.

What will be an excessive expense is insurance, and that's where parents must shoulder the cost.

Students should pay a small fee per hour per child for the day care. Faculty members, who don't already pay the fees students do, should pay the going rate for day care. These are all costs the Rec Council could determine after researching insurance costs.

There are other needs as well. The day care must be run by state-approved health and safety guidelines.

There must be an appropriate supervisor to the day care.

There must be a limit to the number of children in the day care at one time as well as a policy on infants.

The Rec Council will need to look into all these things and make appropriate decisions.

But to begin with, it needs to recognize a student need and a desire to make things happen.

NO FEMALE GIDEONS?

Editor,

Like Randy Crow (Collegian Oct. 10), I appreciate the way the Gideons quietly hand out New Testaments.

In fact, I am so impressed with what they do that I always ask if I can be a Gideon, too.

The answer is, "No." The person handing me the New Testament always explains that men can be Gideons and hand out green New Testaments, but women cannot.

A woman can, however, join the Gideon's Ladies' Auxiliary and hand out brown New Testaments.

Because I'm not an auxiliary human being but a genuine, full-fledged human being, I always respectfully decline the Gideon's invitation to join the auxiliary.

I have never been able to understand why women can't be Gideons. Of course, men have some body parts women do not have and vice versa, but how do these physical differences relate to handing out Bibles, or more interestingly, to the color of the Bibles?

If anyone has solved this mystery, I would appreciate hearing about it.

Sincerely,
Dianne K. Urban

TEACHING CONFLICTS

Editor,

We would like to respond to your editorial (Sept. 25), "Emphasis on Research Limits Quality of Teaching."

Both of us have emphasized in our public speeches and in our actions as administrators that we do not accept the claim that there is an inevitable conflict between teaching and research in universities.

To the contrary, one of our first goals must be to optimize the complementarities between the two. This idea favors the success of both research and teaching and embodies the importance of interaction between senior professors and students.

At K-State, unlike non-research universities, the students are likely to have classes from the faculty who have participated in the latest scientific discoveries and, in many cases, have written the textbook.

Many of our students have an opportunity to participate as assistants in the laboratories of some of our top researchers. Every one of the University's distinguished professors and almost all of our full professors teach undergraduate courses.

It is naive to believe we can progress as a distinguished land-grant university without a strong, aggressive and successful program in research, both basic and applied.

The essential point is not to let ourselves get drawn into the trap of playing teaching against research.

That need not happen — public universities that allow it will not be successful during the next 10 to 20 years.

Enhancing teaching and learning is not a definition for weakening research on an institutional basis.

Let us take just one example of how teaching and research can go together.

Scott Rottinghaus, from Westmoreland, recently won the prestigious Marshall Fellowship. From the time he was a freshman at K-State, he started working in the laboratory of Professor Dick Consigli in the Division of Biology.

As a result of his experiences in the laboratory, he was able to be a co-author on a number of papers at the frontier of biological research.

In reality, this example is multiplied, time and again, with substantial numbers of students across the university.

It is certainly true that we want to place more emphasis on excellence in teaching, similar to our emphasis on excellence in research. We want to place more emphasis on faculty development in teaching, and we want to make certain that our teaching faculty are properly evaluated and rewarded.

But this in no way conflicts with our commitment to remaining one of the top-70 public research universities in America.

Sincerely,
Jon Wefald, president
James R. Coffman, provost

LUNDAY'S REVIEW POOR

Editor,

I was worried Fred Phelps and his group of followers would make a spectacle of themselves before "Jesus Christ Superstar" on the grounds it was blasphemy.

Fortunately, I was wrong about them.

I cannot allow Sarah Lunday's review of "Jesus Christ Superstar" to stand unchallenged.

The only real problem she seems to have with the production is that some of the dancers were less than perfect in her eyes, with a dislike for the portrayal of King Herod as Elvisish.

It is harsh to give the production two stars of a possible five based on this rather minor problem.

Or why not give it just one — after all, they did have some feedback from the speakers to microphones twice during the performance.

Most of her dislike for the show seems to stem from the fact that the portrayal of Jesus Christ in the show contradicts her view of the man and therefore, her view of her one true God.

Contrary to her apparent belief, the Bible Belt of this country is far from being unanimously Christian.

Believe it or not, the Midwest has atheists, Buddhists, Hindus, Jews, Muslims and numerous other beliefs in addition to her rather narrow-minded interpretation of Christianity.

When you consider that even some people who call themselves Christian do not necessarily believe in the divinity of Jesus Christ, her ranting for about half of the article on this point is unwarranted.

Lunday's review of "Jesus Christ Superstar" is poor because she did not like the portrayal of Jesus as a man particularly disturbing with the performance and probably the writing of the article occurring during Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week.

Lunday appears to choose to interpret the Bible as the inherent word of God, while I would guess Andrew Lloyd Webber chose to portray a human and perhaps an historical Jesus.

I would think accepting that people have varying religious views would be a concept to consider during this week, if not all others.

Finally, I, and probably most of those present at what appeared to be a sold-out show, would sincerely like to thank those responsible for bringing this and other such events to K-State, to those who support McCain Auditorium and those responsible for the production.

PASSING OUT PROPERLY

Editor,

In the article "Students get tips for living" in the Oct. 5 Collegian, it was reported that Mary Peterson, Greek 101 lecturer, made the statement that students who have been drinking and passed out should be laid on his or her side.

If they are laid on their side, they may roll over onto their back and asphyxiate on their own vomit.

The proper technique would be to lay an individual on their stomach so they do not roll over onto their back. The following graphic illustrates the proper position.

Administration ignores tradition, student contributions

The University recently announced because of the large private funds donated by the Hale family for renovations of the student library, Farrell would be renamed in their honor to Hale Library upon its completion.

Normally, something like changing the name of a building wouldn't bother me that much. But there are several reasons why this whole situation has pretty much royally ticked me off.

First, it has to do with the fact that the student body was not consulted about this particular change. They were told. There were no debates, no votes, just a press release.

I am not surprised.

At least, I am not surprised by the administration. I expect that kind of unmannerly technique from it by now. Everyone knows they have very little respect for student opinion and therefore work around it whenever possible.

What surprises me is the fact that very few students have an opinion to respect about this. So many of us go day by day not caring what decisions are made for us. Not only about the little things but about about everything.

I knew there were students out there who didn't care what traditions we maintained or what the administration did, but I assumed they were few and far between.

I was naive. There are others of us, however, who do care.

And for us, changing the name of the library without consulting the student body is an insult.

After years of fee increases and months of inconvenient construction, some students felt they should have been allowed the opportunity to have some kind of input into this decision.

For some, it represents more than just changing the name of the building. It involves the changing of a tradition; the fine, longstanding tradition of naming facilities after outstanding scholars, past presidents and other people who have had more than a monetary influence upon the students of this University.

This is a tradition that has for the few years been whittled away to a kind of ass-kissing honor given to the people with the most pennies.

The excuse given for the change was the name Farrell Library has a negative connotation.

The Upper-Ups don't want to scare prospective students away who may have heard about how miserable the old library was.

Might I be allowed to point out that the K-State Wildcats football program had a negative connotation for years, possibly scaring away a few prospective students, but it rose above its reputation to become the hard-working and honored team it is today.

It took hard work. It took dedication. It took revamping the program. It took money, lots of money from many different people.

But it did not take us changing its name to that of the largest donor. (I find it ironic, however, they play on a field named after the fellow who gave the money for the astro-turf.)

Tradition is more than what facts can be picked up here and there. It's not only about dates and names. It's about people — who we were, who we are now and what we are trying to become.

We talk about tradition here, history and excellence. These aren't just words and abstract concepts in some brochure.

These are codes of honor. And yet, by doing this, I think we show how we have forgotten the people who helped set the standards we live by.

The Hales are trying to do their part for the University, and for that we should all be grateful and acknowledge their contribution.

But completely renaming the library just because of their monetary contribution isn't enough.

The Hales didn't build the library alone. So much more money, time and energy was donated by the students.

Not only are we not being recognized for our contributions, we've been insulted.

Farrell is dead and won't give a good gosh darn about whether or not the library is renamed.

Many students on this campus are alive and don't care. But there are a few who do.

We do care, and we won't be ignored.

Associate professor of sociology and director of the Latin American Studies program, Marcial A. Riquelme, was forced out of his native country, Paraguay, more than a quarter of a century ago. Riquelme has been teaching classes at K-State for the last five years.

Lessons learned from exile

K-State professor yearns to return to native Paraguay

Camille Wood
staff reporter

Twenty-five years of exile taught Marcial Riquelme some hard lessons.

"It's always a dream to return," said Riquelme, associate professor of sociology and director of the Latin American Studies program. "But, I'd be away from something that has been my way of thinking, acting and being."

After being deported from his home country, Paraguay, Riquelme found a home in the United States.

The American Embassy granted him a visa because it never believed he was the villain his country's government made him out to be, Riquelme said.

In Asunción, Paraguay, the dictatorship opposed student politics, and Riquelme was arrested several times.

"I was allegedly violating the internal national security law," he said. "I was tortured very brutally, and I went on a month-long hunger strike."

Riquelme has not lived in his native country since 1962 because of past political unrest in Paraguay's government.

In 1987, after traveling to various countries and settling in America, Riquelme found that he could return home.

"During a political amnesty, I regained my passport," he said.

It was a passport he had not seen since he was deported in 1962.

"I started to visit my home country twice a year," he said.

In 1989, the militia was overthrown after nearly 35 years in power, he said.

Alfredo Stroessner had ruled as the military dictator from 1954-1989.

"Only since 1993, we've started to have a civilian government," he said.

Living abroad and being so close to bordering countries led Riquelme to an interest that was close to home.

"I became interested in the illegal and legal immigration and labor markets in border areas," he said.

Riquelme said he began a research repatriation of Paraguay natives and other highly trained professionals. He has written three books and many articles about repatriation and the return migration of Paraguay professionals.

Many natives have returned to Paraguay over the past five years. And Riquelme said he would also like to return home some day. But there isn't a lot of work in his field in Paraguay, he said.

Social sciences have been banned in Paraguay because they are considered subversive disciplines, which are not yet reinstated.

"If I want to be a full-time academician, I would not have a department to join," he said.

Although Riquelme may not return to his homeland soon, there is a connection between the Latin and American cultures, he said.

"There is a strong connection with Latins south of the border and Latin communities living in this country," he said.

For example, Kansas is the sister state to Paraguay, he said.

The relationship was formed by "Partnership for Americas," a congressionally funded program, and Riquelme represents the National University in Paraguay to K-State.

Through this program, American and Paraguayan students are able to exchange cultures by living, learning and working among natives.

Riquelme said he expects there will be many more linkages between Latin America, the U.S. and the Caribbean.

The connections can be attributed to the growing integration caused by the North American Free Trade Agreement, he said.

"I feel Latin America does not stop at the Rio Grande border or the Straits of Florida," he said.

Riquelme said he identifies strongly with Hispanics and relates well to the National Hispanic Heritage month and the ethnic manifestation of pluralism.

"It's very important to be aware of cultural differences and also the similarities because despite the differences, there are many elements in common," Riquelme said.

Dina Bennett, coordinator of multicultural student activities, said Riquelme's knowledge and experiences led the way for K-State's Latin American Student Organization.

"We're very fortunate to have some one of his esteem on campus," said Bennett. "He is a role model for HALO (Hispanic American Leadership Organization) and other Latino students."

Riquelme is scheduled to give a presentation 6:30 p.m. Tuesday in Union 207.

KANSAS LIBRARY NETWORK

Library grants will be used for expansion of collections

Gina Buster
staff reporter

Two K-State libraries recently received grants totaling $7,500 from the Kansas Library Network.

Weigel Library of Architecture and Design and the Veterinary Medicine Library were awarded the grants to update and expand their collections.

The Veterinary Medicine Library received a $4,500 grant to purchase books and videos on animal welfare.

The Weigel Library of Architecture and Design will be using the $3,000 grant to expand their landscape architecture and gardening resources.

The two libraries received grants because they submitted proposals with subject areas that in high demand, Michael Piper, director for Kansas Library Network Board, said.

"The libraries showed the committee these collections are in demand not only with students, but that it would have a statewide impact," Piper said.

Gayle Willard, library director of the Veterinary Medicine Library, said, "Animal welfare in one way or another touches many people's lives. It is a much broader topic than people realize."

An animal welfare collection is already in existence, but because it covers such a wide base, new material was needed for the collection, Willard said. Some of the material within the collection was very one-sided.

"We were concerned because the library receives free material from animal rights advocacy groups. We wanted to buy other materials so people could have a more balanced view," Willard said.

Starting in January, the collection should be available to anyone in the state through the interlibrary loan program.

Janice Swanson, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry, said the collection will bring together social and scientific aspects of animal welfare in a holistic view that will be reflective of current thinking.

"We are not championing anyone's particular viewpoint. There will be a concerted effort made to make sure it is diverse and objective. We want to make sure we have quality materials that are reflective of different perspectives and science," Swanson said.

Ann Scott, reference librarian at Weigel, said there is already a collection of landscape architecture and gardening books, but the additional books will give people a larger body of materials choose from.

"Books on these subjects are becoming increasingly popular as gardening continues to flourish as a hobby for many Americans. It's a popular topic, and it's nice to be able to expand our collections. It's also exciting that we've received this grant two years in a row," Scott said.

Both collections will be available to all K-State students, faculty and staff, as well as anyone who wants to access them through interlibrary loan.

The Kansas Library Network awards grants to help libraries throughout the state support the interlibrary loan program, Piper said.

"The grants help make the interlibrary loan program work more effectively so the libraries can purchase materials that are in high demand through the interlibrary loan program," Piper said.

Wildcats go to Ames for pre-NCAA warm-up

Ryan O'Halloran
staff writer

Cross country coach Terry Drake said he wants rain, wind and cold temperatures for Ames, Iowa, tomorrow when K-State runs at the NCAA Pre-Meet.

Why will the bad conditions help the Wildcats? Because K-State has a better chance of placing well in the meet if the lead pack of runners get slowed down by the rain.

"I hope it's raining and awful weather, because we're more inclined to doing well when the front runners are slowed a bit," Drake said.

But even if the weather is good for the race, the meet is important for K-State and all of the teams involved. The new, $250,000 course was built specifically for this meet and the national meet in six weeks. So the race is a good measuring stick for Drake.

"It'll be a really good barometer for how we stack up in this whole thing," Drake said.

The chance to run a race on the course before the national championships gives the runners an idea of what they need to work on before the title race.

"It gives you an idea of what little quirks the course has, or if it's really hilly," Drake said. "So we come back after the race, and we have six weeks to concentrate on an area we may be lacking in. The main thing is that you know good people are going to be there."

The race will feature 12 ranked teams on the men's side and 12 teams that are either ranked or receiving votes on the women's side.

On the women's side, top-ranked Villanova, second-ranked Colorado and fourth-ranked Stanford will be racing along with Big 8 stalwarts Missouri and Iowa State.

With Charity Swartz back racing after missing the Oklahoma State race two weeks ago, Drake has a healthy team at his disposal.

"This will be the first meet we'll have everybody," Drake said. "Everybody we have who is capable of running is running."

Two of those who won't be running for the women for the rest of the season are junior transfer Kay Mannebach, who has a stress fracture, and freshman Emily Diederich, who has been slowed by illness much of the season.

Drake said she's missed too many practices to be a help to the team this year, and he'll seek a medical-hardship redshirt.

"I'm probably going to hardship her," Drake said. "She got really sick in the middle of the season, and she just missed too much time. The season's so short that if you miss a couple weeks of training, it's tough to come back."

K-State's top runner through the first month of the season, senior Irma Betancourt, is back to full strength after a calf injury hampered her at Oklahoma State.

"I think it's an advantage to us. The harder the course, the better we are. Outside of Irma (Betancourt) and David Dominguez, we're more strength-oriented."

TERRY DRAKE
K-STATE CROSS-COUNTRY COACH

"She had that little problem, but that seems to be pretty clear," Drake said. "We ran her out at Warner Park, and she's gotten over those hills pretty good." Drake said he doesn't know the layout of the course, but he said a hilly spread will benefit the Cats' women's and men's squads.

"I think it's an advantage to us," Drake said. "The harder the course, the better we are. Outside of Irma and David Dominguez, we're more strength-oriented."

Either team finishing in the sixth- to eighth-place range would please Drake, especially after a disappointing race at Oklahoma State.

"Our training has been going well for both the men and the women," Drake said. "I was a little disappointed with how we did at Oklahoma State, but since then, both teams have been training and running well so I think we'll do OK."

On the women's side, Drake expects a middle of the pack finish.

"Irma's just going to run her race, and she'll go out with the leaders, or the second group," Drake said. "And then Charity (Swartz), Cristy Swartz and Samantha McNamara and the rest of the group are all going out together. I'm hoping that we see those four or five girls work as a team."

"If Irma runs well and the next four or five girls run well and finish up front and close together, we'll get a sixth, seventh or eighth finish, and if we get sixth or seventh there with 12 ranked teams, it'll be a good day."

On the men's side, Drake said junior Ryan Clive-Smith could be a runner to watch.

"Ryan's really jacked up for this race," Drake said. "I have a feeling he's going to run well."

Sophomore Eric Hickson crosses the goal line for a touchdown against Missouri. Hickson and the K-State offense will square off against an Oklahoma State defense that has allowed a number of big plays this season.

K-State hits the road to play Cowboys

Ryan O'Halloran
staff writer

Before the blowout wins over Northern Illinois and Missouri, football coach Bill Snyder said the game against the Huskies and Tigers would be the year's toughest test. And he didn't change his tune this week in talking about Oklahoma State, either.

"I think this will be, and I know you'll question me saying this because I said it last week and the week before, but I think this, indeed, is to this point in time, maybe the stiffest test against the running game," Snyder said.

This week's assessment might be true. The eighth-ranked Wildcats go on the road for the first time in more than a month, with kickoff at 2 p.m. Saturday in Stillwater.

The game is the start of a key stretch for the Cats, with games at OSU, at Nebraska and home games against KU and Oklahoma in the next month. It's also crucial because in its only other road game this season, K-State escaped Cincinnati with a 23-21 win.

Although the Cowboys enter the game 1-4 and 19 1/2-point underdogs, Snyder said the Cats need to be concerned about OSU's running game.

"They've always been a good rushing football team," Snyder said. "They have some tremendously talented backs."

The OSU offense is led by tailback David Thompson, who has run for 598 yards this season, good for second in the conference behind Iowa State's Troy Davis.

OSU's running game will be a test for the Cats, who have held opponents to 69 yards a game on the ground this season.

"They're playing well," Snyder said. "I think we're about where we'd like to be. There's still some unanswered questions, but I thought Saturday's ball game was indicative of how far we've come defensively and how well we're playing."

But Snyder said the Cats do have some questions still to answer, and they're not just minor things.

"As I've said before, I thought our schedule as it relates to the opponents' offense versus our defense has gotten increasingly tougher, and that's the way it'll continue."

Snyder said.

K-State should be able to score points against the OSU defense, which has two true freshmen in the starting lineup and several first-and-second year players on the depth chart.

The Cowboys have given up 64, 45, 31 and 24 in their four losses this season to, and they have given up several long runs and big passes — all of which is music to the ears of K-State's offense.

Quarterback Matt Miller's scrambling ability, a focus of discussion throughout the season, has become a sparkplug for the K-State offense. While many other quarterbacks scramble to get out of trouble, Miller has gained 168 yards on the ground this season.

"He has the kind of toughness that it takes to play the position," Snyder said. "He's a guy you've got to be a little bit careful of because he can put it away and run with it."

Snyder said he isn't worried that his team might look past OSU to the showdown at Nebraska next week, and that's due to the fact that K-State was ranked highly a year ago.

"I don't think they see it for any more than it is, because they have been there before," Snyder said.

Netters to take on KU Saturday

Shana Newell
staff writer

While the K-State football team travels to Stillwater, Okla., this weekend, the K-State volleyball squad hits I-70 en route to Lawrence. The Wildcats will take the court against Kansas at 9 Saturday night in Allen Field House.

With a 13-5 record, the Wildcats will face 6-12 Kansas in a match Coach Jim Moore said he considers very important to the team.

"The staff has been thinking about it a lot," Moore said of Saturday's upcoming match.

"That match becomes a must-win if we have any chance to make it to the Big 8 tourney. We must win that match."

In losing to No. 1-ranked Nebraska Wednesday night, the Cats dropped their third-consecutive Big 8 match, making them 1-3 in conference play. The only Wildcat Big 8 win came over then-No. 16 Colorado in an upset that indicated the Cat program might be reaching a high-caliber level of play.

But the consecutive losses the Cats have had in the last week have really shown the team, Moore and Wildcat fans that there is still a long way to go to consistently win as a team like Nebraska.

Moore said that an individual team cannot perform at that high level within a year's time. He said the athletic program within the school must make the goal to succeed, not the squad.

"That's a long, long, long journey," Moore said. "That's not a year process. That's a journey a program takes."

Kansas defeated Missouri Wednesday night in a three-game match in Lawrence. Outside hitter/middle blocker Kendra Kahler led the Jayhawks offensively, hitting .500 with 15 kills. Kahler also had a team-high nine digs in the match.

Middle blocker Maggie Mohrfeld had seven service aces against the Tigers.

To counter the Jayhawk attack, Moore said he will look to his team to work together to get the victory.

Senior hitter Jill Dugan, junior blocker Kate DeClerk, sophomore setter Devon Ryning, and junior play-set-hitter Yolanda "Toie" Young will commandeer the Wildcats in Lawrence.

Dugan leads the Cats with 213 digs on the season. That is good enough to be third in the Big 8. She also has 11 solo blocks, a team high, and 39 block assists. She is hitting .200 this season.

DeClerk is hitting an impressive .396 on the season and .319 against conference opponents. Leading the team in kills and block assists with 204 and 87 respectively, DeClerk will be important to the Cats' success in Lawrence.

Also instrumental in a Cats victory, Ryning leads the squad with 27 service aces and is hitting a solid .356 on the season.

In the 15 matches Young has participated, she has accumulated 190 kills. That is enough to give her 877 career kills and place her fifth on the K-State all-time kill list.

► MADNESS BEGINS SATURDAY

The second year of the Tom Asbury Era will kick off Saturday with Midnight Madness at Bramlage Coliseum.

The gates will open at 10 p.m. for fans, and admission is free. The first 1,500 people into the arena will receive a free T-shirt.

The event, "Midnight Cat Attack," will start at 11 p.m. with giveaways, including a half-court shootout for $10,000 cash and a trip for two to Disney World.

The official start of the college basketball season is Oct. 15, and the Wildcats will take the court at midnight with a scrimmage that will cap off the festivities.

There will be plenty of new faces on display for the fans. Asbury has six newcomers on this year's roster, many of whom will contribute right away for the Cats, who open the regular season Nov. 25 against Bradley after exhibition games against the Russia Club Team on Nov. 11 and Pella Window on Nov. 18.

STUDENT SENATE

Senate approves 7 new allocations

College Republicans one group to receive money

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

Student Senate approved five allocations and two special allocations Thursday night.

College Republicans received an allocation for $768.30 for three projects, including a newsletter.

Brenda Halinski, graduate senator, proposed an amendment to eliminate $17.50 from the allocation for the newsletter project. The amendment failed.

Halinski said she had a fundamental problem with Senate funding newsletters as projects.

"I don't think we should fund a newsletter," she said.

Alpha Phi Omega, a service organization, also had a newsletter project planned. Halinski again proposed an amendment to eliminate funding for the newsletter. The amendment failed, and the allocation passed.

Mortar Board, the senior honorary, also received an allocation for $701.90 for a speaker.

The allocation passed with a vote of 45-10.

The allocation for Campus Girl Scouts was debated for more than an hour.

The Allocation Committee approved $522.50 for a speaker during March, but Senate attempted to amend it out. The amendment failed by a vote of 30-25.

"I personally think the group should get off the ground in regards to membership and then come and ask for money," said Bill Muir, faculty representative and author of the amendment.

Because the group had only five members, Muir said he did not think it should be awarded such a large amount of money.

"Numbers do not dictate the effectiveness of a group," Tricia Nolfi, student activities coordinator, said. "I have stayed up all night with a group with 62 members who get grid-locked and can't make a decision."

She said Senate should not determine the effectiveness of a group.

Janelle Moore, arts and sciences senator, said she was in favor of the amendment because she could not justify giving an honorarium to a group who had no idea who would be the speaker for the event.

Michael Henry, arts and sciences senator, said he thought it was unfair to judge the Girl Scouts by how long the group had been on campus and how many members the group had.

"If Campus Girl Scouts don't have enough members, we'll get the money back anyway," he said.

Other senators were concerned that the entire campus would not benefit from the event.

"We're here to benefit students who are already on campus," Jennifer Higerd, arts and sciences senator, said.

The allocation passed by a vote of 31-25.

The fifth allocation was for Chi Alpha Christian Fellowship for $979.40. Chi Alpha requested funds for a Christian Film Night and a speaker. The allocation was passed by a vote of 49-6.

Special allocations were approved for the Chinese and Taiwanese Student Association for a film festival and a tennis tournament.

The total allocation was $258. It was approved by a vote of 49-6.

A second special allocation was approved for Students for Peace and Justice.

The $5 allocation was for reduced rate telephone service.

The allocation was approved by a vote of 51-4.

Regular allocations for Black Student Union, Students for Sustainability, Young Democrats, Hispanic American Leadership Organization, Asian-American for Intercultural Awareness and Students for Peace and Justice made for a total of $9,059.10.

An allocation for $300 to the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls was sent back to the Allocations Committee.

Jill Hayhurst, human ecology senator and president of Smurthwaite house, said KSUARH voted last week to charge $3 for participation for any person not in the residence halls.

A resolution supporting the idea of tuition accountability was presented.

Tuition accountability is a program proposed by K-State and the University of Kansas.

The program was endorsed by the Kansas Board of Regents, and it will be presented to the legislature in January.

Tuition accountability would allow K-State to keep 2 percent of any increase in tuition.

This would allow the universities to keep up with their peer institutions in funding.

The second resolution supports bicycle registration with a mandatory enforcement starting date of October 1996.

Alice Williams was also approved as a new arts and sciences senator.

Denise Schneweis, Gamma Phi Beta senior in accounting, eludes an oncoming rusher from the Sigma Kappa house during the finals of the Tau Kappa Epsilon Powder Puff football league. The Gamma Phis beat the Sigma Kappas 24-12 in the finals.

Gamma Phi Beta wins title game against Sigma Kappa Thursday night

Jamie Willey
staff reporter

Gamma Phi Beta crushed Sigma Kappa, 24-12, Thursday night during Tau Kappa Epsilon Powder Puff Championship game.

"I wouldn't say our team has the most talent, but I think we won because in our minds we stuck together. We were never divided. All for one and one for all," Denise Schneweis, senior in accounting and member of Gamma Phi, said.

The game, which is a TKE philanthropy, raised $675 for the Special Olympics. The money was raised by a $90 per sorority team fee and the sale of T-shirts.

Schneweis said the team also received a lot of help from their coaches throughout the season.

"Our coaches have stuck with us all the way. They picked us up when we were down and pushed us onward," Schneweis said.

Kelly Mahoney, junior in kinesiology and member of Sigma Kappa, said even though her team lost the final game, it was a fun way to get to know people.

"We didn't play up to our potentials. We didn't run our plays right, and we didn't communicate," Mahoney said.

All 11 sororities were represented in the league this year, and each team was coached by TKEs.

The league was not affiliated with the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, but it does use the same basic rules as the Rec Complex's flag football league, said Drew Stewart, junior in milling science and management, and co-chairman of the philanthropy.

League games were played on Tuesdays and Thursdays and began the day after Labor Day. The final three games, two playoffs and a championship, were played Thursday night.

The all-star game will be played next Thursday, Stewart said.

The league games had controversial calls and the officials, who were made up of fraternity members, were not as professional as the Rec Complex officials, but that made the games more fun, Stewart said.

Chad Sanem, co-chairman and junior in special education, said the games were fun to watch and the money went to a good cause.

"I volunteered first of all because it raises money for a good cause, and because it's fun to come out here with the sororities and fraternity and everyone and have fun," Sanem said.

Stewart said the teams are competitive this year and matched evenly. He said around 100 people showed up to watch the games each night.

Rachel Jones, senior in secondary education and English, said she enjoyed playing in the league this year.

"I like the intensity and the spirit of teamwork," Jones said.

REVIEW

Jazz musicians play in Union

contributing writer

David Basse and the City Lights Orchestra seized Union Station last night with stalkerly, adulterous, yet light, sophisticated humor in a jazz performance that drew in approximately 100 people.

Mike Hodgson, UPC Chairman, said it was the UPC Eclectic Entertainment Committee's most successful venture of the fall program.

The jazz band was originally presented as an option for the EEC fall program, said Hodgson, a sophomore in pre-law, English and advertising.

"Last spring, we co-sponsored the 10th-annual Manhattan Jazz Festival with New Currents, the music department and the Manhattan Fine Arts Council at the Wareham Opera house that Basse played at," Hodgson said. "I thought he would add a nice variety to our programming this fall. I checked it out with the committee, and they agreed," he said. "We try to hit as many genres as possible."

The crowd seemed to approve of the committee's selection. "The City Lights Orchestra did a good job with a variety of music from classical to contemporary jazz," Athena Hicks, sophomore in pre-law and criminology, said.

One couple from the audience made a road trip from Junction City to see the performance.

"We like jazz quite a bit, and Basse is just great," Diana Merson said.

"With a lot of bands, you just don't catch on to the beat, but he really gets you going."

The audience seemed absorbed in the sly, yet weary drag of Basse's voice, the sultry intrusion of unpredictable brass tantrums, and the climactic, but tight, chemistry of the bass and drums.

Basse, the vocalist and one of two drummers described the music as a Kansas City-style jazz.

"We like jazz quite a bit, and Basse is just great. With a lot of bands you just don't catch on to the beat, but he really gets you going."

DAVE MERSON
JUNCTION CITY RESIDENT

"It's very much based on a more swinging blues that has a little different sound," he said. "The Kansas City swing-type music makes a music that's more for dancing."

This was evident in the traditional, mourning slide of the blues and classically indulgent, confessional nature of their interpretation of both conventional and more contemporary blues.

Basse lists a variety of influences in his experience with both blues and jazz categories, including Tom Waits and Joe Williams.

"I started doing music at 11 years old, and I was playing professionally throughout the Midwest by age 14," Basse said. "It's all I've ever done."

The nationally renowned band have five releases available from the 1984, "Raised Spirits" to the 1992 release of "Other Brothers." These are available in Kansas City or by phone.

The number is 1-800-811-CITY.

LOU DOUGLAS LECTURE

Speaker to focus on growing world population

Karrin Thomas
staff reporter

The rapidly growing world population will be the topic of the next Lou Douglas Lecture at 7:30 p.m. Monday in the K-State Student Union Forum Hall.

Werner Fornos, the director of the World Population Institute, will present "Gaining People, Losing Ground: A Blueprint for Stabilizing World Population."

"We're excited about having him at K-State, because he's one of the world's foremost authorities on population and concerns about using up the earth's resources," said Gloria Rumsey, coordinator for the Lou Douglas Lecture Series. "I'm anxious to hear his talk, because I think he has some answers — hopefully some answers we can accept."

In his book, "Gaining People, Losing Ground," Fornos said, "World population actually should be a cause for optimism, because it is one social issue that we can really do something about."

Fornos attended the 1994 International Conference on Population and Development in Cairo, Egypt, and he recently returned from the U.N. Fourth World Conference on Women.

The Population Institute is the world's largest independent, non-profit educational organization dedicated to achieving a more equitable balance between the world's population, environment and resources.

The Population Institute tries to make sure the United States honors its commitments made at the 1994 International Conference on Population and Development where 180 nations agreed to a program of action that recognized the need for stabilizing population.

"The world's population is 5.7 billion and expected to double in about 45 years at its current rate of growth," Bill Parks, media coordinator for the Population Institute, said.

"Fifty million women want access to family planning but lack access to it," he said.

MANHATTAN

Bill for broken pipeline might come to $9,350

Robert Patnode
staff reporter

City and county engineers are developing a plan that could cost some Manhattan residents a total of $9,350.

The Riley County Commission and the Manhattan City Commission discussed the new water pipeline to be installed at the bridge over Wildcat Creek, south on Manhattan Avenue.

County public works director Dan Harden said replacing and relocating the broken water pipeline south of Manhattan Avenue could cost area residents $9,350.

The current pipeline extends below water level, but debris on the surface has created a problem.

The two-inch thick pipeline will have to be relocated because the debris on the surface of the water at the current site created the breakage, Harden said.

"We need to remove the debris and replace the pipeline, but it will cost money," Harden said. "Part of the problem is money. People out there don't want to spend a lot of money."

City Commissioner Justin Kastner said the board was discussing different ways of installing the pipeline.

The cheapest method is to install the pipe on the east side of the bridge because of the proximity towards the rest of the pipeline, Kastner said.

He said they do not want to spend a lot of money if the pipeline will break again, but Harden said it will probably happen again.

"This was created by the high amount of water last May," Harden said. "There was a problem back in 1993 with the floods. When you have a high level of water, that is when you get a great deal of debris and that's the problem."

Manhattan Mayor Edith Stunkel liked the plan of relocating the pipeline but didn't like the cost of it. "Is it worth it?" Stunkel said. "That's our main concern. Our objective is we need to remove the debris in a timely fashion."

Area residents are left with contaminated water as engineers continue to create a path for the pipeline that will alleviate the problem.

Harden said the debris collect at the pillars of the bridge. He said over time, the debris will gradually collect under water and dig below the surface and that is where the problem begins.

lives and free us," Gorman said. "How many of us can say that we are a disciple of Christ by the testimony of how we live our lives?"

Gorman shared his experiences and asked that God knock on hearts and convict students of sexual sin, perversion, lust, greed and dishonesty.

"God is calling us all to turn, to turn from sin. He wants to be an all-consuming fire in our lives," Gorman said.

"We have to make a conscious effort to seek him both spiritually and in our actions."

Mary Bocox, senior in education and president of Intervarsity Christian Fellowship, encouraged members of her chapter to attend and share their faith.

"It's a great opportunity to worship God and bring unity among the Christians at K-State," Bocox said.

The effect of worship is greater when many groups gather together in prayer, Bob Anderson, campus minister, said.

"Each group has their own identity, but there is real value in coming together and finding an identity in Christ," Anderson said.

Art isn't always for the masses

Page Getz
contributing writer

If you like art, you can have your cake and eat it too tonight at Java Espresso and Bakery.

The opening reception of Leah J. A. A. Cunick's "At the Corner," will display the paintings and drawings of both her personal work and her work as a senior in fine arts at K-State from 5 to 7 p.m.

Cunick said she doesn't believe in the limits of varying definitions of art.

"Art is art, and no one can say what that is," Cunick said. "If just one person considers it art, then obviously it's art."

"People really get stuck on whether or not you can call something art, but we don't have the right to say if it is or isn't," she said.

"It's just ego; it's only their opinion."

Cunick, who is pursuing her certification as an emergency medical technician, said she could not deny the magnetic appeal of art.

Instead of using her certification as an EMT professionally, she has decided to focus on the therapeutic value of art.

"My father always taught me that no matter what you are, you can help people, and that's always been how I see anything I do," she said.

"People find connections through art. We can put moods and feelings into it that can't be described in words," she said. "Being manic depressive, it clutters my mind a lot, but through art I can get it out, and others can recognize it."

"Maybe it puts them at ease to know someone else is going through it, too."

Cunick said she hasn't played into the restrictions of academia, and that is mainly why she is in her sixth year here.

"I'm a very eclectic learner. For me, the regular academic courses put a lot of stress on me because I put a lot of my energy into classes I don't need."

"It's pretty easy to put your soul into a class like drama therapy, or my EMT class, so I go through school really slow," she said. "Art isn't emphasized enough, especially with children."

Cunick said she uses her art as a more natural source of personal therapy through her own struggle with manic depression.

"For me, it's my normalcy," she said. "If I didn't have that moodiness, that up and down temperament, I don't know if I would do it."

"You can get to this point where you're completely numb, and you feel like you're stuck in a really bad black-and-white 'B' movie with no plot," she said.

But for Cunick, this neurotic energy has become part of the motivating ammunition for her creativity.

"I've learned a lot in the last couple years about dealing with the depression naturally. Like a plant needs sunshine, I become completely reclusive without access to nature, to light," she said.

"I love to work with horticulture — to make something grow. It gets me out in the sunlight," she said.

"My art is the same way in that it makes you feel alive. Even to get just a little piece done, it makes me feel better about myself."

There are many people out there just like you. The problem is that society demands so much that people lose their virginity, those that choose otherwise are afraid to speak out.

I have one more thing to add: While I don't think you need to give up on your own morals and values, perhaps you could forgive others who long ago gave up on theirs. I know many people who have lost their virginity and now regret not waiting. They are now what I call "born again" virgins and have made the same conscious decision that you have made.

People make mistakes, the key is to not hold them to them. £

Decision to maintain virginity shows emotional maturity

Dear Cassie,
I am a 25-year-old, male graduate student, who is also by choice a virgin.

When I was still in high school, I decided I would wait until I got married to have sex.

I'm not a religious fanatic (though I do go to church every week), nor am I fat or ugly (I'm probably a little above average in looks), nor am I a prude (a pretty girl excites me as much as any other guy), I just think that leaving sex out of a relationship helps to clarify your reasons for dating that person.

If I'm dating a girl, I must really like her for her personality and intelligence; otherwise, I wouldn't be dating her at all.

Now to the point of my writing this letter. When I was younger, I had no doubt that I would eventually find the right girl for me, a girl with whom I had a set shared values, and who had also waited to have sex. Now, however, I have begun to wonder if that will ever really happen. I hear about 12- and 13-year-old teens having sex, and I wonder if there are really any college-age women who are still virgins? Am I foolish for having saved myself for someone who doesn't exist?

Sincerely,
A.

Dear A.,
I commend you on your choice to abstain from sex until you are married.

With today's spread of sexual and life-threatening diseases, such as AIDS, it is important for people to consider their health and the health of the person or persons with whom sexual relations will exist, as I'm sure you know.

And not all persons who choose to abstain from sex, either while still a virgin or a "born-again" virgin, are religious fanatics, fat, ugly or even prudish.

In your case, I think the decision might have a more emotional element to abstaining from sex. If I read you correctly, you choose to omit sex from a relationship on the basis that it only makes the relationship stronger.

I agree with you on this issue. In many relationships, sex is the battlefield around which everything is centered.

For some people, sex is the only reason they give for staying involved with someone who is not good for them. Many men and women alike have been involved in relationships where "if it weren't for the great sex, we'd have broken up a long time ago."

For others, it is the blanket that covers all other problems.

So, to answer your question: I ask you, are you not involving yourself in situations where you might find this perfect person or are you perhaps disillusioned with the idea that everyone has had sex since they were 13? If this is the case, I suggest you stop watching Jerry Springer.

JUSTICE DEPARTMENT

Acquittal rare in spousal murder trials

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — How rare is the outcome of the O.J. Simpson trial? Only 2 percent of husbands charged with killing their wives are acquitted at trial, a Justice Department study finds. And the race of the accused or the victim does not appear to affect the verdicts and sentences.

One major finding of the just-completed study was that wives charged with killing their husbands were convicted less often than husbands facing spouse murder charges — largely because women successfully argued they were defending themselves from a husband who had abused them.

The study by the department's Bureau of Justice Statistics was prompted in part because the Simpson case generated questions from the news media about spousal murder data. Simpson was acquitted last week on charges of murdering his ex-wife, Nicole Brown Simpson, and a friend of hers, Ronald Goldman.

Some experts said Thursday the study's results undermine some criticisms of that verdict, in particular the perception that black juries won't convict black defendants, and the resulting suggestion the jury system should be altered.

The Justice study sampled spouse murder cases concluded in 1988 in the nation's 75 largest counties, where more than half of all murders occur each year.

"This is the best and most comprehensive study ever done of spouse murder," said Marvin Wolfgang, University of Pennsylvania professor of criminology and law.

The study projected that the cases of 318 husbands and 222 wives accused of killing their spouses were concluded in those 75 counties that year.

Of the male defendants, 46 percent pleaded guilty, 41 percent were convicted at trial, 11 percent were not prosecuted and 2 percent were acquitted at trial. Of the guilty, 81 percent were sent to prison, for an average of 16.5 years.

Of the female defendants, 39 percent pleaded guilty, 31 percent were convicted at trial, 16 percent were not prosecuted and 14 percent were acquitted at trial. Of the guilty, 57 percent were sent to prison, for an average of six years.

Patrick A. Langan, senior Justice statistician and co-author of the study, said self-defense by women clearly accounted for their 70-percent conviction rate, compared with 87 percent for men. Of the female defendants, 44 percent had been threatened with a weapon or physically assaulted by their mate at or near the time of the killing, compared with only 10 percent of the male defendants.

"In cases where there was no provocation, husbands and wives had an identical conviction rate," Langan said.

The victim's race made no significant difference, the study found. Convictions were obtained in 81 percent of cases with a white victim and 79 percent with a black victim.

Among defendants, 78 percent of whites and 80 percent of blacks were convicted.

Spouses were of the same race in 97 percent of the cases.

The differences in sentences by race of accused and victim also were too small to be statistically significant.

Of 91 husbands tried by juries, all were convicted. Husbands won acquittal only in trials by judges — 17 percent of the time.

Women who went to trial were acquitted 27 percent of the time by juries and 37 percent of the time by judges.

"The lack of a jury acquittal of a male in this size sample doesn't mean it never happens, but it's very rare for a man to be acquitted by a jury of murdering his wife," said Langan. "And these large counties, which include Philadelphia, Chicago and New York, have large black populations with many black juries. Those black jurors are not tolerant of husbands murdering wives."

Wolfgang said the data carried a message about the Simpson verdict.

"The perception by some that husbands charged with killing are treated more leniently than wives by the courts is in error," he said. "A higher percentage of husbands are convicted, and a higher percentage go to prison for longer periods of time."

Eleanor Smeal of the Feminist Majority Foundation said the data indicate that race and gender are not undermining justice in spousal murder cases.

"The difference in the Simpson case was the power of money," Smeal said. "What normal person would have had the money for the best experts and enough lawyers to mount tens of thousands of objections?"

Wolfgang said the Justice findings closely parallel results from his study of 100 spousal murders in Philadelphia during 1948-52. Langan said the 1988 database was the most recent and complete available for the study.

MEN

million African American men will cover the grass of the National Mall, from a stage at the foot of the Capitol to the Lincoln Memorial. Such a turnout would be unprecedented for a demonstration.

According to Park Service estimates, the biggest turnout for a demonstration was 600,000 people for a 1969 Vietnam War protest. The 1963 civil rights march led by Martin Luther King Jr. drew an estimated 250,000 people.

Other events, such as the bicentennial fireworks celebration in 1976, have drawn an estimated 1 million people, but they were spread over more of the city, Park Police said.

Although organizers of the Million Man March have been meeting with local officials for months, the city was still working out details of street closings around the mall just four days before the event.

"It's not unusual for things to get very chaotic," said Maj. Robert Hines, a Park Police spokesman. "You start out planning one of these things months in advance, and things don't get really intense until right beforehand. Then people start changing their minds about what they want to do."

One sign of confusion is organizers initially asked reporters to pay $5 each for press passes to cover the event, then rescinded the request Wednesday.

"That was somebody's brilliant error who hadn't studied the First Amendment," Muhammad said.

In addition to the rally, Farrakhan has asked African American men who can't attend — as well as women and children — to stay home from work and school Monday to mark a day of absence.

March organizers are urging African Americans to avoid spending any money that day to demonstrate black spending power.

Some African American leaders have declined to endorse the march because it is lead by Farrakhan, who has made comments offensive to whites, Jews, homosexuals and other groups. Some also have complained because women were not invited.

President Clinton has some deep reservations about the organizers of this march, in particular Reverend Farrakhan, press secretary Mike McCurry said Wednesday.

"The president finds it encouraging that people would come together in an effort to promote the concepts of personal responsibility and responsibility to community," McCurry said.

African American men coming to the rally are asked not to stay in hotels, but instead to leave town Monday night or stay in volunteers' homes. Hotels report that few rooms have been booked for the event.

For an April 1993 gay rights march, which drew an estimated crowd of 300,000, hotel rooms were filled from Richmond, Va., to Baltimore, Md.

"There still could be half a million people here, if they are avoiding hotels," said Emily Vetter president of the city's hotel association. "I don't think anybody knows, really."

Benjamin Chavis, another march organizer, has said at least 10,000 buses are expected from every state in the country.

The American Bus Association did an informal check of 15 of its largest members, and found only about 75 buses chartered for the event, mostly from the Northeast and Atlanta. But bus association spokeswoman Ginger Croce said thousands of small companies have one or two buses, and churches nationwide own buses.

Across the Potomac in Arlington, Va., school bus service was canceled for Monday because almost half the drivers are taking the day off to attend the rally.

Pankey said he expects about 100 to 200 people to attend the day's activities.

"I feel that the march will be successful, but this is the first year, and not too many people know about it," Pankey said. "We are just trying to inform people anyway we can."

Abdulhaqq said he hopes all black people on campus and in the Manhattan community will participate.

"We are not concerned about the number of people we have," Abdulhaqq said. "We are concerned about getting a message across and to come up with a plan to address our issues and concerns on campus."

All black students are asked not to go to class or work and to attend the activities for the day, he said.

Although all black students are asked to participate, women are asked not to march, Pankey said.

Black women are the black man's backbone, but this is a time for the men to stand up and care for their responsibilities, Pankey said.

"We are not saying that we don't need the black woman's support," Pankey said. "Now, this is the time that men must stand up for black women and black families."

Natalie Purnell, freshman in pre-professional business administration and member of BSU, said she does not think women should be excluded from the march.

"Personally, I don't think that it's fair to us women because without our help, the men wouldn't be having this march," Purnell said. "We are their backbone and their life. We make the man."

ROULETTE DATES. On October 14 you'll be glad to hear, it's back again for the 56th year. We've tapped the keys and iced down our beer, stocked up on our Jack and Everclear. Thirteen hundred rebel yells to declare: "It's time to don the old hat and sprout that wild, as hair." Our Wranglers are starched; our ropers are shined; and we're ready to dance and romance and unwind. For some of the best, this one is the last. So we'll make damn sure it lives up to the past. We'll saddle the horses and head for the plains, to meet the band's refrains. Drinkin' and dancin' beneath wide open spaces, raising some hell with our friends in low places. With all you fine ladies and us cowboys together, no party could ever be better. So jump in some boots and throw on your hat, this party starts at 1919 Platt. It comes from our hearts which makes it much better. It's more than another barn party, cuz this one's for real and we call it Roulette! So prepare to get rowdy underneath the stars, because you haven't partied cowboy until it's with the AGR's. The Roulette Ghost

POLICE SHOOTING

Death penalty considered for Topeka murder suspect

Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Shawnee County district attorney said Thursday she will consider seeking the death penalty for a man held in connection with the shooting death of a Topeka police officer.

District Attorney Joan Hamilton said she will study police reports before deciding whether to try Stephen Medford Shively, 34, for capital murder.

"This fits the provision of capital murder," Hamilton said.

Police officer Tony R. Patterson, 31, died early Thursday after being shot once during a drug raid at a Topeka apartment. Patterson had a wife and two small children.

"He was one of the greatest officers," Hamilton said in an interview at her office. "He was here just yesterday, and I was teasing him about being a fixture in this office. He was one of the best."

He and his partner, Bruce Voigt, both members of the Street Crime Action Team, or SCAT, were serving a search warrant for marijuana when the shooting happened at about 2:50 a.m. Four other officers were with them at the time.

The officers announced who they were and attempted to force the apartment door open, knocking out a wood panel, police said.

A single shot was fired from inside the apartment, police said.

Hamilton said the bullet entered Patterson's armpit and penetrated his heart. She said she did not yet know what type of weapon fired the fatal shot.

"He didn't have his weapon drawn," Hamilton said, referring to Patterson. "He never even gained entry."

Police alongside Patterson returned fire, but Hamilton said she did not know how many times. The Police Department convened its Firearms Review Board to determine what precisely happened.

Shively was taken into custody after being shot in the calf as he was fleeing toward the rear of the apartment. Hamilton said he underwent surgery at Stormont-Vail Regional Medical Center Thursday afternoon. Hospital officials declined to comment on Shively's condition.

Hamilton said Patterson's partner, Voigt, and other officers attempted to resuscitate Patterson before ambulance attendants arrived.

He was declared dead at about 3:30 a.m. at St. Francis Hospital and Medical Center.

Hamilton said the two officers, as members of SCAT, were wearing what they called street gear during the raid, which included black clothing with black bulletproof vests with the word "police" in fluorescent lettering.

The other officers were in regular uniforms.

The armpit where the bullet entered Patterson's body was uncovered by the vest.

"He had his arm up," Hamilton said.

She said Patterson was considered one of the best members of the eight-person SCAT unit and made frequent drug arrests. The unit was formed a couple years ago to focus on street drugs and gang crime.

Patterson and Voigt were frequently seen in the gang-infested parts of Topeka.

"He and his partner were very professional, very thorough, very competent," Hamilton said.

At the Topeka Police Department, officers wore black stripes over their badges.

Police Chief Gerald R. Beavers declined to talk about the details of the shooting.

"He loved his job," Beavers said.

"He and his partner just seemed to thrive on their jobs."

Beavers said the SCAT unit will remain active.

"This is a tough time and some of those folks have some tough times ahead of them," he said. "We're not closing up shop."

Gov. Bill Graves ordered all flags at state government buildings to be lowered to half-mast.

"Linda and I join all Kansans in extending our profound sympathies to the family of Officer Patterson," Graves said. "His relatives, loved ones and colleagues remain uppermost in our thoughts and prayers."

Patterson is survived by his widow, Julie, and two children, Mitchell, 6, and Casey, 2. A fund for the family has been established at Commerce Bank and Trust Co. The funeral will be Monday at Holy Name Church in Topeka.

Crowning Miss K-State

James Dierking
staff reporter

With tears in her eyes and a look of disbelief, Alicia Shaneyfelt, senior in theater, was crowned Miss Manhattan/K-State Saturday night at the Wareham Opera House.

"I just got lucky, and it was my time to shine — and through the grace of God it finally happened," Shaneyfelt said.

Shaneyfelt, a Manhattan native and graduate of Manhattan High School, competed against six K-State women in the 39th annual pageant.

"I felt really calm — not that I wasn't anxious or nervous, but I had this really weird feeling," she said.

The audience came to a hush as Susie Stanfield, executive director of the pageant, announced the new Miss Manhattan/K-State.

"When they said I had won, I didn't move. I had my eyes closed, and someone was telling me to come up and get my crown when one of my best friends tackled me to tell me congratulations," Shaneyfelt said.

As a Manhattan native, Shaneyfelt had many supporters in the audience, but her father was unable to see her compete.

"My father opted to go to the K-State-Oklahoma State game because he said the Cats needed him more than I did," Shaneyfelt said.

But Shaneyfelt's father did return from the game in his purple K-State attire about 15 minutes after the pageant was finished.

Shaneyfelt was second runner-up in the pageant last year and fourth runner-up in the 1993 pageant.

"We're a little disappointed in the crowd. We had expected a larger number. But they were responsive to the girls and were a good crowd," Stanfield said.

With the title, Shaneyfelt won a $1,000 scholarship and the chance to compete at the Miss Kansas pageant in June.

"Any chance to go to Miss Kansas is a great honor, but a chance to represent my hometown is extra special," Shaneyfelt said.

Lesley Moss, senior in electronic journalism and public relations, was first runner-up and received a $500 scholarship.

Moss also received the interview award for the highest point total in the private interview sessions.

Second runner-up Deana Teske, junior in broadcast journalism and public relations, won a $300 scholarship.

Third runner-up was awarded to Tara Smith, freshman in communication disorders, who won a $200 scholarship.

"The judges were very impressed with the girls that we had," Stanfield said.

Stanfield said Shaneyfelt already has several appearances planned, including the upcoming K-State Homecoming parade. Groups or other organizations who would like to schedule an appearance can contact Stanfield.

"I just can't wait to get started," Shaneyfelt said.

KU jumps over Cats in Top 10

Jeremy Crabtree

Kansas 34, Iowa State 7. K-State 23, Oklahoma State 17.

That's all it took for the Jayhawks to replace the Wildcats as the highest-ranked team in the state this week. KU moved up three spots to No. 7, and K-State remained No. 8 in both the Associated Press and the USA Today/College Coaches Poll.

But both teams are 6-0 and 2-0 in the Big 8 Conference. Do the hated rivals from down the river deserve to be ranked ahead of the Wildcats?

Apparently, some K-State students think so.

"KU is pretty good," Travis Freidline, junior in secondary education, said. "If we had played Oklahoma State like we had the past three opponents, then we should be ahead of them. But, they put Iowa State away pretty handily."

"It's pretty hard to say, but they should be up there higher than us," he said.

Matthew Hamm, junior in architecture, said the Jayhawks are playing better than the Cats right now.

"My honest opinion is that they beat Iowa State fairly handily," Hamm said. "With that and their victory over Colorado, I thought they should take the higher ranking."

Most students said they thought the reason for the Jayhawks' jump was due to the Wildcats' small margin of victory against Oklahoma State.

"We should have beaten Oklahoma State more handily," said Jason Fornshell, junior in business management. "Oklahoma State had two weeks to prepare, but our defense let up."

"They didn't show that they were the No. 1 ranked defense this week. They'll need to play this week. Especially since they are going into Nebraska. They've got the best college home crowd in the country."

Still, not all students are convinced the Jayhawks are that good, despite beating the then No. 4 ranked

Gay speaker stresses change

Heather Stephany
staff reporter

Education is the answer to changing attitudes toward homosexuality, a speaker for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Week said Friday.

An audience of about 20 people listened to Scott Curry, a student at the University of Washburn Law School and the first openly gay man to address the Kansas Legislature, in the Union Little Theatre.

"It's time for us, here in Kansas, to add our voices to those of our brothers and sisters all over the country and say, very simply, in whatever small way we're able, 'This is something I have the ability to change.' And then change it," Curry said.

One way to begin changing attitudes is to be aware of deceptions and dispel them with the truth, Curry said.

"The deception is that these radical Christians are 'conservatives,' or 'social conservatives,'" he said. "They are not."

Conservatives want to maintain the status quo, but radical Christians are wanting things to be how they were for Ward and June Cleaver in the tv program "Leave It to Beaver," he said.

"They want to alter our country, to reform it into a country that meshes with their very narrow system of beliefs," he said. "This is not social conservatism — this is radicalism."

The followers of radical Christian leaders fail to see they

BGLS declares week successful

Becky Klenken
staff reporter

Organizers of the third Annual Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual Week said attendance for events improved from last year.

"I think the week was a success," said Heather Nelson, co-president of Bisexual, Gay and Lesbian Society and senior in psychology.

Attendance was better than last year, she said.

"We saw a lot of new faces," Nelson said.

Last year, many of the students attending the seminars and speeches were required by their professors to go. This year, those in attendance seemed to be there because they wanted to be, Nelson said.

"Attendance was very good compared to what I thought it would be," Rodger Belyea, freshman in psychology, said.

The amount of publicity for the week was less than last year for financial reasons, Nelson said.

"The publicity for the event was a good surprise because I thought that it would be just word of mouth and BGLS members only," Belyea said.

BGLS publicized the event through flyers, word of mouth, a listing in the Collegian and articles by Collegian reporters, Nelson said.

Wendi Smith, freshman in elementary education, said she did not participate in the events but had heard about the week.

"I heard about the week from reading about it in the newspaper, but I didn't attend anything," she said.

Nearly 400 people of all ages and ethnic backgrounds danced to the beat and listened to the music of a steel drum band Saturday night at Bombers.

The Hispanic American Leadership Organization sponsored its sixth-annual Gran Baile dance in Aggieville to celebrate Hispanic Heritage Month. Arleen Baiges, chairman for the event, said,

"We always have this in Aggieville so people can experience this kind of music," Baiges, senior in industrial engineering, said. "We hope that not just people on campus, but from the community and Fort Riley, will come out and see what is going on."

She said the only time a Hispanic band comes to town is when HALO sponsors this event.

"There is a very good turnout. It's what I expected," Baiges said. "This party is always packed."

The band Mambo X from Kansas City played and sang salsa merengue, music with a Caribbean sound, for the many dancers and observers.

Arson suspected in Manhattan fire

Sera L. Tank

A fire Sunday night at 1026 Yuma St. left the fire department and neighbors suspecting arson.

Chuck Tannehill, assistant director of the Manhattan Fire Department, said there are a few signs pointing to arson and said there will be an investigation.

The two biggest indications of arson were that the house was unoccupied and there were two separate points of origin for the fire in separate and unrelated areas of the first floor.

"What we're going to have to do is investigate. It's suspicious at this point," Tannehill said.

But, he said, there is an investigation for every fire.

"It may turn out to be a perfectly logical explanation," he said. Tannehill said there wasn't much damage.

"Most of the structural damage was to the finish on the floors and walls," he said.

Tony McDonald, a neighbor's grandson, was the person who reported the fire.

"I drove up and saw the flames through the window," he said.

McDonald said he was concerned about the fire spreading to his grandmother's house.

"It looked like it had gone any further, it would have caught our house on fire," he said.

McDonald said he thinks arson is the most likely explanation for the fire.

"It looks like arson to me because no one has lived there in quite a while," he said.

In the news

BLACK MEN UNITE IN WASHINGTON TO DEMONSTRATE ECONOMIC POWER

WASHINGTON (AP) — Black men converging on the nation's capital for today's Million Man March described it as a unifying, uplifting event that transcends its controversial originator, Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan.

"It's not about a march, a man, words. It's about a movement," the Rev. Vernon Clay said after a Sunday sermon urging the men of Lincoln Congregational Temple in Washington to attend.

The event, actually more of a rally and prayer meeting than march, is called a day of atonement and reconciliation.

Supporters describe it as a call for black men to take responsibility for their own lives and families, and to dedicate themselves to fighting the scourges of drugs, violence and unemployment.

Organizers asked women — and men who can't come to the rally — to stay home from work or school to mark a holy day, and to avoid spending any money as a demonstration of black economic power. No one knows how many will take part.

The idea originated with Farrakhan, and he has been its chief organizer, with the help of ousted National Association for the Advancement of Colored People chief Benjamin Chavis Jr.

But it has attracted a wide coalition of support, including Jesse Jackson, Rosa Parks and several black members of Congress and mayors and ministers. Many said it's unfair now to characterize it as Farrakhan's event.

"It was his idea, he dropped the seeds," said Clarence White, a postal worker who traveled from San Antonio, Texas, for the rally. "But it's no longer his. It's ours."

BOSNIA WAR CONTINUES; 50,000 SERBIAN REFUGEES FIGHT FOR LIVES

BANJA LUKA, Bosnia-Herzegovina (AP) — Fighting ebbed Sunday in northwestern Bosnia, where up to 50,000 exhausted Serbs were struggling to survive after fleeing advances by government and Croat forces.

In a bitter twist in the 3 1/2-year-long war, many of the refugees are now at Omarska, site of one of the most notorious prison camps set up when Serb rebels overran much of Bosnia in 1992.

A field hospital has been treating both civilians and soldiers wounded in the latest fighting.

Aid workers said some older refugees are dying, apparently exhausted after being uprooted by rapid shifts in front lines in northern Bosnia in the past six weeks.

The U.S.-brokered truce that started Thursday was largely observed throughout the country, U.N. officials said Sunday.

The Muslim-led Bosnian government said Saturday that it was halting its offensive, amid reports Serbia had to threaten to send in the Yugoslav army.

A mechanized Croatian army unit, including 22 tanks, was crossing back into Croatia on Sunday, U.N. spokeswoman Leah Melnick said in Zagreb.

Muslims and Croats in the northwest have a powerful motive to keep fighting — revenge for reported Serb atrocities during the takeover of the region in spring and summer 1992.

CONVICTED SEX OFFENDER'S ARRAIGNMENT SCHEDULED FOR WEDNESDAY

The arraignment for convicted sex offender Mark Hansen will be 2:30 p.m. Wednesday at the Riley County Courthouse, 555 Poyntz Ave.

Hansen will be informed of the charges against him, and he will be asked to enter a plea. A date will then most likely be set for his trial.

Hansen was arrested March 31 for violating conditions of his Pottawatomie County probation after he gave a sexually explicit letter to an 8-year-old girl. He was charged with aggravated indecent solicitation of a child.

Excerpts from letters Hansen wrote an 8-year-old Riley County girl were read at his preliminary hearing, which took place last week, to determine whether there was probable cause a felony was committed and whether there was probable cause Hansen committed it.

In the letters and an interview with Detective Theresa Mason, Hansen said God had given him a gift to have sexual intercourse with females who were moved by the spirit and who asked the correct question, which he said was "Will you fuck me?"

Hansen had originally been on probation stemming from a Sept.

10, 1993, arrest for aggravated indecent liberties with a child in Pottawatomie County.

Riley County lists Hansen as a regular sex offender under Kansas law.

Hansen posted bond and now lives at 2419 Anderson Ave., a few blocks away from the schoolyard he was found loitering on earlier this year.

Citizens can obtain a list of all habitual sex offenders in Riley County at the Riley County Police Department.

Aggieville celebrates October with German food, crafts and entertainment

Aggieville could have passed for an old German village filled with crafts, entertainment and authentic German foods.

From 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Saturday, the streets of Aggieville were blocked off so people could enjoy the 15th-annual Oktoberfest Food and Craft Fair.

"It's just a perfect day for an event like this," Melany Swedlund, senior in elementary education, said. "I just like being outside and enjoying the nice weather."

Booths full of handmade crafts lined the streets of Aggieville. Items ranged from fine woodwork to pumpkins carefully decorated in the spirit of the Halloween season.

"I can't imagine the time that goes into making some of these things," Karyl Powell, junior in pre-nursing, said. "I know that I wouldn't have the patience."

It was hard to miss the various food vendors set up at this year's Oktoberfest.

"I love smelling all the good food," Cori Lomax, junior in education, said.

Foods ranged from funnel cakes and fresh baked goods to roasted corn on the cob and baked potatoes. In the tradition of Germany, bratwurst, piled high with sauerkraut, and bierocks were also available.

"The food here is great," Benton Boyd, senior in elementary education, said.

"It seems like this is the only time of year that I ever think about eating things like bratwurst and bierocks."

Lucky BrewGrille sponsored a beer garden that was a frequent stop for some of the people that joined in the Oktoberfest celebration.

"When I think of Germany, I think of beer, so I guess I better stay with the spirit of the event," Boyd said.

Eight-year-old Morgan Thierer performs a flip on the Manhattan Gymnastics Center trampoline Saturday afternoon at the 15th-annual Oktoberfest Food and Craft Fair in Aggieville.

For the first time in the history of the event, there was live entertainment all day long. About 75 people watched stomp aerobic demonstrations and performances by the Classy Cats.

The college crowd was able to enjoy live music throughout the day. Jenni Raynor and Hard to Handle performed first, followed by Coolerspoon and Turquoise Sol put on a rousing performance to end the day.

"I thought the live music was really exciting," said Catherine Devries, senior in family studies and human services.

"I wish more people in Manhattan would become more involved with live music."

This year's Oktoberfest featured more activities for children and their parents than in past years. Activities included clowns and face painters, go-carts, pony rides and an exotic petting zoo.

"We came here for the kids," Kathy Pauls, Manhattan resident, said. "They've been on the trampoline, rode the ponies and been to the petting zoo."

But activities weren't necessarily limited to children.

"I love the go-carts," Devries said. "I want to ride them, but I'm kind of scared to."

A few K-State groups participated in this year's Oktoberfest. Farrel Library sold books and baked goods, and the Horticulture Club was decorating and selling pumpkins.

"It's a fundraiser for the club," Kiffnie Holt, junior in business administration, said. "We've had great business so far."

Oktoberfest even drew groups like the Hare Krishnas from Denver. The group was busy taking donations and handing out books to people passing by.

"It's a great opportunity to reach a lot of people," said Mike Day, member of the Hare Krishna group.

Committee keeps Bramlage's $1 fee

Cristina Janney
city-government editor

The Student Senate Privilege Fee Committee voted unanimously Sunday night to approve the continuation of the Bramlage Coliseum student fee at its current level.

Full-time students pay $1 for the fee. Part-time students pay 25 cents.

The Bramlage fee and five other fees are up for regular review by Senate this year.

Committee members have discussed making some fees user fees, which would mean only students who use services would pay for them.

However, the Bramlage fee is not used for student services. The $35,000 Bramlage receives from the fee is used for repair and maintenance. The fee money represents only about 7.5 percent of Bramlage's budget.

Charles Thomas, Bramlage director, said a user-fee system would mean cuts for Bramlage.

He said cuts would mean Bramlage would have to raise revenue from other areas, such as concessions, rentals and ticket sales.

He said a large increase in the cost of any of these services would mean less business for Bramlage.

"If we bump up the price of concessions, people won't buy," he said. "Rentals are the same way. We are competing with venues in Topeka and Salina. We have to have some leave way to negotiate with promoters."

"That leaves a ticket surcharge, and I don't think that would be very palatable to the public."

Committee members decided user fees were not applicable to the Bramlage fee.

"I don't think it is a smart thing to do," Carrie Miller, committee member, said. "If we raise ticket prices, no one will buy them. The same with concessions."

Bramlage has a $35,000 reserve, but the committee members did not think the reserve should be used for a temporary cut in the fee.

Thomas said the reserve was needed in case something would break or a natural disaster, such as a fire or storm, caused damage to the building.

"If the money was not there and something broke, we would have to cut back what we normally do and put the money into fixing something," he said.

He said those cutbacks could include student employees. Bramlage has a payroll of $300,000.

"Something would have to give somewhere," he said.

Joshua Hulse, committee member, said Bramlage should be allowed to keep its reserve.

"I agree with the motion to keep the fee at a $1," he said. "Bramlage is a special situation. User fees are not applicable here. I don't feel the reserves are out of line. They might be a little low if an emergency would arise."

The motion to keep the fee at its level passed unanimously. The fee will be considered by Senate Operations Committee at 9 tonight in the Office of Student Activities and Services.

A bill concerning the fee will be up for first readings at the Senate meeting Thursday and is scheduled to be voted on next week.

Mark Tomb, Privilege Fee Committee chairman, said he did not yet know how linear payment would affect student fees.

He said the committee would review and approve the fees using the current flat-fee system. Fees would be converted to the linear system sometime in spring.

The linear-fee system is supposed to be revenue-neutral, which means it would not affect the amount of money organizations funded by student fees would receive.

Basketball campout loses sense of excitement

So how can we breathe some life back into the great tradition of the campout?

You waited in anticipation for days. You had members of your organization stationed around Ahearn Field House, or you had a telescope on top of your residence hall.

Then came the mad dash when the flag was raised, and everyone scrambled to get their tents assembled.

The basketball ticket campout. Ah. What a tradition.

A tradition that has sadly fallen flat during the past few years.

We could name any number of reasons for the lack of enthusiasm for the campout — student apathy, a stricter enforcement of the rules following a rape that occurred during the campout a few years ago, and publicizing when the flag will be raised in an effort to make the process fair.

But the big reason for lack of enthusiasm has to be this — we've turned into a football town.

We used to look forward to basketball because football games were so awful. "Just wait until basketball season," we'd taunt KU fans after a football loss.

But now, most fans are too wrapped up in anticipation of Nebraska and KU to care about whether the basketball team is getting ready for their season.

So how can we breathe some life back into the great tradition of the campout?

Combine football and basketball tickets, and have the campout during the first week of school. That way, students will get preferred seating to both events, and the campout will become more than the sad shadow of what it used to be.

We want to see flags, hoards of people playing touch football and music playing all hours of the day and night. Enough visible fun to make everyone walking by wish they too were camping out.

Combine the tickets, and bring back the spirit of the campout.

Keeping loyalties on a

Global level

I am a citizen of planet Earth first and foremost, and a citizen of the United States second.

My patriotic values demand my loyalty and allegiance be toward my planet and my species first, before my loyalty to the nation where I was born — meaning the United States.

In other words, I am an internationalist.

This is not to say I am putting the United States down — quite the contrary.

I happen to believe the United States, for all its problems and weaknesses, has done a remarkable job of creating and maintaining a society made up of multiple cultures, disparate beliefs and varying ways of being. I think we have a lot we can teach the rest of the world about living together in peace.

What I mean when I say I am a global citizen is that the United States is second in importance to the rest of the world and it is high time we as the people of the United States realize this.

We have lived so long under the banner of "We're No. 1" that we have lost sight of the rest of our family — the human family — and the recognition that the United States, although far wealthier than any other nation, is NOT the most important country on the planet.

We have become arrogant and smug in our self-importance and have forgotten we aren't superior to our equals in the rest of the world. To paraphrase our own Declaration of Independence, "All nations are created equal."

In the grand scheme of things, we are just one of MANY nations.

And as such, we need to think hard about how what we do affects the rest of the world.

As the environmentalists put it, "Think Globally, Act Locally." It's a principle I try to use in my daily life as a citizen of Earth, because it applies to politics, international relations and day-to-day living as a Terran just as much as it applies to the environment.

I realize some might object to my use of the phrase citizen of planet Earth, for there is no global government for me to pledge my loyalty to — although I believe it is inevitable and someday the United States will be just one state among many in a planetary system of government. If the Europeans can come together under one system of government after having been bitter enemies for generations, surely it's possible on a global scale.

My global citizenship is not a legal one, but rather one of mindset — I see myself as a global citizen, regardless of the existence, or lack thereof, of a global government.

But make no mistake about the power of this mindset. If forced to choose between the good of the United States and the good of the rest of the world, I'll choose the rest of the world every time — just as I would put the needs of the United States above the needs of Kansas, to which I also have loyalty.

This subsuming of national interests to the interests of the world is a difficult, even frightening, proposition for many people to accept. But I think it will come about regardless.

I long for the day when the United Nations has greater autonomy as an elected governing body with the power to police the world effectively.

I look forward to the day when the United States and all other members of the security council give up the right of veto and stop putting their national interests in front of international ones.

On this, the 50th anniversary of the United Nations, it is time we all started thinking about how we can make our country, and ourselves, better international citizens.

► OFF-BASE REVIEW

Editor,

Sarah Lunday's review of "Jesus Christ Superstar" is perhaps the only one I've ever seen that needs translation from English to English.

So she'll know for future reference, performers may have excellent voices but are not "excellent in voice." Music does not "translate" characters and characters are not "translated" from performer to audience.

The word she may be dimly grasping for here is "perform." This and other creative usages of the language render an already simple-minded review nearly unreadable (or should I say untranslatable).

More importantly, Lunday has not even the slightest grasp of what proper criteria to use when reviewing a play.

The Collegian editor may as well have sent Fred Phelps to do a story on Gay/Lesbian/Bisexual Awareness Week than Lunday, who obviously values her theology over journalistic objectivity.

If Lunday cannot bring herself to evaluate pieces whose subject matter is her Lord, than she would do well to excuse herself altogether and aim her efforts where they might be more appreciated, like a church newsletter.

Lunday's mentality is a good example of why the arts are in danger in this country: She and others like her peer out of the narrow box of their own viewpoints and lack either the wit or courage to accept a world view different than their own.

That is entirely her choice, although I wonder why such a person would be interested in the theater in the first place, where conventions are constantly taken apart and challenged.

However, her position becomes offensive when used as justification for exhorting a play that does not deserve it.

If Lunday insists on working for the Collegian, despite her horrific writing abilities and close-minded approach, at least confine her to the Classifieds section, where she'll do the least amount of damage.

Mentors influence, nurture lives of students during college years

K-State will be losing two fine individuals who have dedicated years of service to this campus and especially to the students.

All students should have a mentor during their college career, someone to talk to not just about academics but other personal issues.

Mentors should not be limited to academic advisers but to anyone who can be trusted and cares.

I have always had a core of mentors or older friends around me, older and wiser individuals to aid me with my many decisions.

I strongly believe everyone needs a mentor to talk with and relate to.

As I have grown and moved on down the road of life, my mentors have changed.

The following are two individuals who have added something special to my life.

John B. Riley, assistant director of academic programs for the College of Agriculture, has dedicated countless hours of service to the College of Agriculture, the campus, state youth organizations and the Manhattan community.

Riley has accepted the position as the dean of agriculture and natural sciences at the University of Tennessee in Knoxville.

This is an excellent opportunity for Riley but at the same time a loss to this campus community.

I have had the honor of getting to know Riley both professionally and personally during my career at K-State.

The persistence and dedication he has exhibited is incredible. He has spent countless hours in Waters Hall working with student projects.

It was suggested by several members of the Agriculture Marketing Team that Riley have a sleeper sofa in his office so he could catch a little shut-eye before returning to his real job.

He has been available to me for my problems and crises. I have a truly tested mentor relationship with Riley.

He is a true friend of mine.

The student activities sector of campus is losing a young, resourceful adviser. Patricia S. Nolfi, coordinator of student activities, has accepted a position with Rutgers University in New Jersey.

Nolfi has received many achievements during her short time at K-State.

She has become a resource of ideas for me and numerous other student organizations across campus.

Her countless hours of service in the Big 8 room Thursday nights (Student Senate) should not go unnoticed. Nolfi should receive the Kansas State University Nobel Peace Prize for playing peacemaker in the Office of Student Activities and Services.

As a member of Student Tribunal, I believe Nolfi's assistance with the rebuilding and reforming of the Student Judicial System was her greatest achievement.

It's unfortunate she will not be here to see the first year of the new system and its outcomes.

I was deeply saddened to hear that both Riley and Nolfi are leaving K-State.

But, at the same time, I am happy they are moving down their road of life and achieving their goals.

As you begin this week, think about your mentors and your relationship with them.

They might be friends from back home, older teachers or professors or even family. Continue to build new mentors, and strengthen present relationships.

If you don't have a mentor, think about building a mentor relationship.

It can be easy to build a relationship of a lifetime. All it takes is effort and a caring individual.

Taking a shot at a lifelong dream

Yesterday was the most important day of my life. I didn't win the lottery. I didn't get a job. I didn't even meet that special someone I'll spend the rest of my life with.

I tried out for the K-State basketball team. And I probably didn't make it.

My love of K-State basketball dates back to Dec. 22, 1979, when my dad took his 6-year-old son to Ahearn Field House to watch the Wildcats take on the 6th-ranked Minnesota Golden Gophers. The Cats lost that game 78-61, but the fever had caught, and the excitement of that game still courses through my veins.

Since that day, playing K-State basketball has been a dream of mine.

Every shot I took on the driveway was a buzzer-beater that stole the game from those hated Kansas Jayhawks. Every pass I made in practice fed Rolando Blackman for that fateful shot that beat Oregon State.

I celebrated like a madman when the Cats downed the 2nd-ranked Beavers at Pauley Pavilion in the NCAA Tournament, and I sat in disbelief when North Carolina ended the Cats' miraculous run.

And I knew that someday, I would play my part in taking the Cats to the Final Four.

But times changed. As a high-school sophomore, the simple fact that there are only 24 hours in a day forced me to choose between basketball and debate. I chose debate.

My basketball career continued in the Salina church league, where I switched back and forth between center and point guard. We won four games in three years, but we had fun.

My intramural teams have met with mixed success over the years, once making the playoffs and reaching the finals in three-on-three. But that championship T-shirt continued to elude me.

And so did my dream of playing for the Cats.

Not that I had done much to further that dream. I've put on some pounds since coming to college, and not all of them have come from the weight room. My ball-handling skills have slipped, and I don't have the endurance I used to.

But I still had the dream. I thought about trying out every year, but never got around to it. I lived out my dream from the sidelines, watching every men's and women's home game and writing sports for the Collegian. But it's just not the same.

I realized this year that my time was running out. In my fifth (and, I hope, final) year at K-State, I would soon run out of eligibility.

And so I tried out.

I would like to think that I dazzled the coaching staff with my aggressive post play and my pinpoint passing. But somehow I doubt it. I would be surprised to see myself on the bench in purple this November.

But that's no longer what's important. I tried. I realized a dream, and I did what I could to make it happen. It wasn't the best I could have done — I could have worked out and gotten in shape over the summer. I could have polished up the fundamentals. But I didn't. And it's too late now.

I've taken my shot — and I hope every K-State student gets a chance to do the same. Whether that dream is studying abroad, playing football or learning to play guitar, college is perhaps the only place you can take a real shot at your dreams, no matter what they are.

I want to thank the men's basketball coaching staff for the opportunity to try for something I have always wanted.

I want to remind all of the members of the team how lucky they really are. You get to do something you love, and you get your tuition paid. Hold on to that. This is the best any of us could ever hope for.

Finally, I want to wish good luck to the 13 others who tried out yesterday. Willie, Justin, Opienthal, Arthur, Bryan, Mike, Cory, Shannon, Kevin, Carlton, Paul, Casey H. and Casey K., I hope you get your chance in the spotlight.

Congratulations for having the courage to chase your dreams.

Cats survive scare against Oklahoma State

Shane Newell
staff writer

Coach Bill Snyder is not crazy. This is what he would have more conservative Wildcat fans believe after the Wildcats pounded out its sixth victory this season.

In K-State's 23-17 victory, the Cats went for fourth-down conversions six times. Five of those six times, the Cats succeeded.

"I thought we could get first downs. If we don't, we're in pretty precarious territory," Snyder said. "Trust me on this — there was a risk, but not as much as it seemed. I'm not crazy."

Fourteen of K-State's 23 points resulted directly from fourth-down conversions, while a failed fourth-down conversion in the last seconds of the game indirectly tacked on an additional two points.

At the top of the third quarter, with the Cats leading 7-3, the offense found themselves in a fourth-and-3 situation at the Cowboys' 25-yard line. Quarterback Matt Miller connected with wide receiver Mitch Running on a 14-yard pass, giving the Cats a first down at the Oklahoma State 11-yard line.

Two plays later, Miller found wide receiver Tyson Schwieger in the end zone.

After a conversion by kicker Martin Gramatica sailed through the goal posts, the Cats jumped the lead to 14-3.

In the fourth quarter, with 7:37 remaining in the game, Miller engineered a Cat drive to the end zone. The drive allowed the Cats to regain the lead over the Pokes 21-17 after a 91-yard touchdown run by Cowboy tailback David Thompson minutes before.

The Cats began the drive at their own 20-yard line but quickly moved downfield as Miller passed to Running for 33 yards. Another Miller pass, this time to running back Eric Hickson, placed the Cats at the Oklahoma State 28-yard line.

Hickson again got the ball from Miller for a 6-yard gain, taking the Cats to the Oklahoma State 22-yard line. Hickson then rushed for a gain of 1 yard, and the Cats found themselves stuck.

With 6:01 left in the game, Snyder called a timeout. Miller came in and threw an incomplete pass on third-and-3.

On fourth-and-3, Snyder made his "crazy" call — he went for the first down.

Miller rushed up the middle for the 3-yard gain before being tackled by lineman Lorenzo Green. But the rush was good enough for a Cat first down, and the offense took it for all it was worth.

An 18-yard pass from Miller to tight end Brian Lojka was all K-State needed to regain its lead.

"It's what they gave us. We just caught them on it," Lojka said. "I think I ran off 30, 35 seconds after I got the ball and got into the end zone."

In K-State's next possession, Snyder again went for a first down after Miller and company were able to fight their way from the Oklahoma State 40-yard line to the Oklahoma State 9-yard line.

On fourth-and-5, Miller again rushed up the middle, but was only able to find 2 yards.

Oklahoma State regained possession on downs with seven seconds remaining in the contest.

But a quarterback sack by defensive end Nyle Wiren for a safety ensured there would be no Cowboy comeback.

"Those were critical downs, and we got it done," Miller said. "That says a lot about our O-line and our offense."

The win was the seventh fourth-quarter comeback for the Cats since Snyder arrived.

The Oklahoma State offense ran the ball on the Cats as expected, outrunning the defense for 257 yards compared to 187 K-State rushing yards.

But with 17 completions in 21 attempts, Miller was able to throw the ball for yardage, gaining 261 yards.

Backup quarterback Brian Kavanagh contributed 20 additional yards after Miller was taken out of the game briefly in the second quarter because of a late hit.

The receivers were used equally, with Running receiving a team high of six passes and running for 80 yards. Hickson and Schwieger each had four receptions, and Lojka had two.

Wide receiver Kevin Lockett had only three receptions but was not unhappy. He said the opportunities were not always there.

"A lot of the time, we were open, but we couldn't get passing lanes open for Matt," Lockett said.

Instead, Miller was forced to throw to Hickson.

"He's the type of player who whether he's running the ball or catching passes, you're going to give him the football because he's a good player," Lockett said.

"Today, we found a couple of situations where we could throw him a little short pass," he said. "That made up for a couple of situations where Matt couldn't find us receivers down the field."

Also playing a key role in the game was Kendyl Jacox. Although he is listed as an offensive guard, Jacox took over for center Jason Johnson after an injury in the first half.

Jacox said he was prepared for the call and was not nervous when he went on the field.

"We were ready for it. I take reps in practice every week at center and guard," he said. "I didn't have time to think about it. I was on the sideline, and someone yelled Jason was hurt, and I had to get in there."

With the victory, the Cats have defeated the Cowboys in six consecutive seasons.

The Cats are now 6-0 as they prepare to face defending national champions Nebraska Saturday.

This is the first time the Cats have been 6-0 since the 1910 squad went 7-0 to open the season.

Fourth-straight shutout eludes Wildcat defense against Pokes

Shane Newell
staff writer

The K-State defense locked up its sixth victory Saturday in Stillwater, Okla., as the Wildcats overcame a determined Oklahoma State, 23-17.

"We're only as good as we need to be," Coach Bill Snyder said after the game.

The Wildcat defense allowed the Cowboys to gain 273 yards in a game that prevented the Cats from achieving its fourth consecutive shutout victory.

An impressive 226 of those yards came from rushes by Oklahoma State, including a 91-yard touchdown run by junior tailback David Thompson.

The Cowboys were able to defy the K-State defense to take the lead, 17-14 in the third quarter. It was the first time the Cats had not maintained the lead since their trip to Cincinnati in September.

"We've been there a ton of times, and we've been scared," he said. "I think that's a great tribute to Bob Simmons and to his staff and what they have accomplished."

While the offense fought to put points on the scoreboard, the defense was struggling with its blocks. Snyder said he was unhappy with the defensive performance throughout the game.

"If we go back and look at it, I just know that they ran the ball on us," he said. "Today, I was concerned with some of our tackles, and I think that had something to do with some of the yardage that they got on us."

The K-State offense was unable to reach the end zone on its last possession, turning the ball over on downs at the Oklahoma State 7-yard line. But the defense showed that it was still determined to win, even without a shutout.

Defensive end Nyle Wiren sacked Oklahoma State quarterback Tone' Jones in the end zone for a loss of 7 yards and a safety. With only 1 second remaining on the board, the Wildcats emerged from the struggle victorious.

"I don't believe that our guys misunderstood who we were playing. Some people get your number sometimes," Snyder said. "We came down here and played a team that it's notorious that we're going to have a close ballgame with."

Cornerback Joe Gordon gave Oklahoma State a lot of credit for its performance against K-State.

"They did a good job executing. There's a part of me that has to give Oklahoma State a lot of credit," he said. "In the past, it's always been a tough game."

With 5 minutes and 29 seconds remaining in the fourth quarter, the Cats were able to stop a Cowboy drive at the Oklahoma State 40-yard line.

Linebacker Percell Gaskins said that was the biggest play of the game for K-State.

"With the backs that they have, you give them a crease, and they're gone. I just can't say enough about their backs," Gaskins said.

Gaskins said the defense expected a tough game in Stillwater and was not taking a victory for granted.

"Ever since I've been here at K-State, every time we came in here it's a barn-burner. I didn't expect anything else. Their coaches had two weeks to scheme our defense, and I think they did a great job scheming. We came away with the win — I'm happy," he said.

Gaskins said he is disappointed the defense could not continue its shutout streak.

"Our defense has a lot of pride — it really hurts. But the coaches have told us not to get caught up in the statistics. We'll look at them at the end of the season," Gaskins said.

"That's really when it matters. It doesn't matter now. We'll just play ball, and we came away with the win, and we found a way to win, and that's the key."

Offense dominates at Wildcats' first practice

Ryan O'Halloran
staff writer

Defense was a rumor, three-pointers and dunks reigned and the mascot basketball game was comical. In other words, it was Midnight Madness at Bramlage Coliseum Saturday night.

A large crowd stayed up late to ring in the 1995-96 men's basketball season, the second season under Coach Tom Asbury.

After an hour of hype leading up to the midnight starting point, the Wildcats, with six new players and five second-year players, took to the floor and scrimmaged for 30 minutes.

"We played a little better than we did last year," Asbury said. "We were much more active offensively, and we weren't as tight as we were last year."

While assistants Mark Fox, Bob Hanson and David Campbell coached the teams, Asbury sat courtside, watching the full squad practice together for the first time.

Newcomer Anton Hubert showed off his 39-inch vertical leap by playing most of the scrimmage above the rim, and Tyrone Davis proved he can hit the three-pointer. But other than that, with no defense being played, Asbury couldn't come to many conclusions.

"You just get a little bit of an idea," Asbury said. "Some guys are 4 o'clock players, and some guys are 7 o'clock players. It's obviously too early to tell — some guys are great practice players but don't perform the same way in games."

"It's too early to single anybody out in a situation where you haven't had an opportunity to talk about defense in a practice setting," he said.

In the early weeks of practice, K-State will be able to work on concepts more than conditioning because the coaches have been running the players through individual workouts since school started.

Before the regular season starts at home Nov. 25 against Bradley, Asbury said, the practices will be shorter.

"We'll shorten practices a tad bit because we've had an opportunity to work with the guys on an individual basis for the last seven weeks so we should be a little further ahead," Asbury said.

In the first day of real practice Sunday, Asbury threw everything but the kitchen sink at the team.

"We'll go through just about everything," Asbury said of the 1 to 3:30 p.m. workout. "We'll cover a lot of different areas, and we'll hit a lot of things the first day."

The public's next chance to see the team is Oct. 28 from 10 to 11 a.m. before the 12:10 p.m. start against Kansas.

"I hope we get a nice crowd," Asbury said.

"It'll end at 11 and still give people a chance to go and tailgate before going to the game. By then, we will have a little more structure, and we should be a little more fine-tuned than we were tonight."

Asbury said he was happy with the crowd, a half-and-half split between the public and students.

"I didn't know what to expect," he said.

"Last year, with it being our first year, I thought we would have a good crowd, and we did. I would say this was a comparable crowd. They were very enthusiastic, and I think we were better organized for it."

► CROSS COUNTRY

Runners show well at pre-NCAA

Collegian Staff

K-State ran the same course it will run next month in Ames, Iowa this past weekend in the NCAA Preview Meet. The men finished 12th out of 20 teams, and the women finished 13th out of 22 teams.

"It wasn't an awful day," Coach Terry Drake said. "We were really, really close to being eighth or ninth in both divisions."

On the men's side, junior Ryan Clive-Smith was the top Wildcat finisher, placing 29th. He was followed by junior John Thorpe in 34th, sophomore Paul Birnbaum in 69th and junior David Dominguez in 80th.

"Paul ran his best race in his career here and consistently ran and moved up through the whole race," Drake said.

Clive-Smith has been K-State's No. 1 or 2 finisher in his last three runs. At the Jayhawk Invitational, Clive-Smith finished fifth in the race won by Thorpe. After not running in the KSU Invitational, Clive-Smith placed 21st at the OSU Jamboree two weeks ago.

"Ryan was in about 10th place with 1 kilometer left, and that's just going to come with time," Drake said. "In another month, he'll be up with those guys in the front."

Senior Irma Betancourt led the K-State women, finishing 36th. This season, Betancourt has finished fourth, eighth and 36th in her three races — each time as K-State's top finisher.

Betancourt could have finished much higher had she not lost a shoe with 1-1/2 miles left in the race. She was in 15th at the time, dropped back to 50th while retrieving her shoe and gained 14 spots back before the end of the race.

Freshman Cristy Swartz was 54th, followed by junior Samantha McNamara in 58th and sophomore Charity Swartz in 88th.

Iowa State, which came into the race ranked, was a few points ahead of the Cats, and Drake said he is confident K-State can overcome the Cyclones at the Big 8 Championships.

"Irma not losing her shoe and Charity running better — we can beat Iowa State," Drake said.

K-State now has two weeks to train for the Big 8 Championships Oct. 27 in Lawrence.

"The thing that's nice for us is that our kids who are from Kansas ran their high-school meets there so there's no surprises on the course," Drake said.

Both teams will face stiff competition, especially in the men's division.

► VOLLEYBALL

Cats take KU in 3

Rich Petley
staff reporter

The K-State volleyball team traveled down Interstate 70 for a Big 8 Conference match against the Kansas Jayhawks. When all was said and done, the Cats came out of Allen Fieldhouse with a victory, winning 15-12, 15-11, 15-12.

"We really only had one lapse," K-State coach Jim Moore said. "We had them down 14-5 in game two, and they came back to 14-11. They let the ball drop for the fifteenth point."

Earlier in the week, Moore said winning the match was essential for the Cats.

"It was an absolute must-win," Moore said. "It was a match we knew we should win. We did what was necessary to win the match."

"We didn't play really well," Moore said. "We're still pretty tight. The players knew it was a must-win, and they got it done in three."

And they got it done in front of an NCAA record crowd of 14,300. The Cats ended a three-game losing streak and improved to 14-5 for the year. The Cats are now 2-3 in conference play.

Despite its size, Moore said the crowd never got into the match.

"They got noisy in game two when they made a comeback, but overall, the crowd was not a factor. They weren't a very knowledgeable crowd," Moore said.

Junior Kate DeClerk led the way for the Cats, recording 16 kills in 27 attempts hitting .481. Defensively, she had 11 digs.

Junior Yolanda "Toie" Young and freshman Val Wieck each added nine kills, while senior Jill Dugan had seven. Dugan also led the Cats defensively with 20 digs. Sophomore setter Devon Rynning had 41 assists.

K-State's next match will be Wednesday at Wichita State. The Cats then face the Missouri Tigers 7:30 p.m. Saturday in Ahearn Field House.

► TENNIS TEAM COMPETES AT RIVIERA

The K-State women's tennis team finished the qualifying rounds of the Riviera All-American Championships Saturday at UCLA.

Each of the three women K-State placed in the singles draw received first-round byes but only one managed to advance to the third round. Sophomore Lena Pilipchak was defeated in straight sets by Emma Doyle of San Diego State 6-4, 6-5, and sophomore Dinah Watson fell to UCLA's Jody Anglin 6-1, 6-2.

The only Wildcat to escape her second-round match was Yana Dorodnova, who dropped Annie Yang of Nebraska 6-2, 7-6 (7-5).

"It's the kind of match that's good to get out of the way," Coach Steve Bietau said of Dorodnova's earlier victory. "She didn't play very well. She had some typical first-round jitters."

The win sets Dorodnova up for a third-round showdown with UCLA's Kelly Rudolph. Rudolph has dropped only 10 games in her two matches so far. A Dorodnova victory would pit her against either Catherine Bernstein of Virginia Commonwealth, who defeated Dorodnova at the Clay Court Championships in Baltimore two weeks ago, or Simone Bock of New Mexico State.

K-State's doubles team of Dorodnova and Watson was also defeated in its first match 8-2 by a pair from Northwestern. Bietau said he was more impressed with Dorodnova's doubles play than her singles.

"The score probably doesn't reflect it, but she played much better in doubles," Bietau said.

In the main singles draw, senior Karina Kuregian will play Stanford's Ania Blyzinski in the first round. Kuregian and Pilipchak will compose K-State's doubles entry, but the draw has not yet been set.

REVIEW

Scamps prove you are never too old to be cool, hep cats

Russell Fortmeyer
contributing writer

Some of you cool cats out there had better get outta the freezer and into the frying pan, because the Scamps played at the Columbian Theatre Friday night to a half-filled house.

Yes, those masters of Kansas City jazz brought a little bit of downtown KC to uptown Wamego.

The Scamps aren't five guys named Moe, rather, they are Oscar 'Lucky' Wesley, on bass and their ring-leader; Jimmy 'Coots' Dye, tickling the ivories; Art Jackson, on tenor sax; Eddie L. Saunders, on alto sax, and Wallace B. Jones, the gum-chewing drummer.

To give you an idea of their age, let's just say if you're thinking somewhere between 65 and 75 you're thinking on the level.

"We're the last of this breed," Wesley said.

The Scamps, which have been playing in and around Kansas City since 1932, started as a singing group. The band began playing dance music in 1946.

Friday's smooth performance was pure classic jazz. The repertoire included "Misty," "As Time Goes By" and "Don't Get Around Much Anymore."

Most of the audience, which was mainly senior citizens with a couple of youngsters, practically had to nail their feet to the floor to keep from jumping up and dancing.

Following "Misty" in the first set came "September in the Rain," which was the first number with vocals. Wesley did most of the singing but was delightfully backed-up by Jackson and Saunders, the sweetest couple of sax smoothies you'd ever want to meet.

Jackson and Saunders could melt butter with a toot of the sax, kill you with a whimsical grin and then put you in the grave with the vocals.

Even the nudes painted in the murals on the walls of the Columbian couldn't help but smile with satisfaction.

The Scamps closed the first set with "Flying Home," which never fails to get a few hearts beating.

Before leaving the stage, bassist Wesley joked, "Would you believe our pianist just had open heart surgery? I just have an open pocket book — that's all." The second set included the red, hot "Straighten Up and Fly Right," "Kansas City" (always an audience charmer in these parts), and "Don't Get Around," which featured lovely vocals by Columbian Artistic Director Linda Haynes Uthoff.

A standing ovation brought one more number: "Bye, Bye Blackbird" sung graciously by Jackson. The audience even chimed in on the chorus.

Wesley said the Scamps try to play jazz for everyone. That's why they concentrate on classical jazz.

"Some people play jazz so far out people don't understand it," he said.

The Scamps just cut an album three weeks ago, so expect to see them on tour.

The band has endured Jackson's test of endurance. "Jazz has to be played from the heart and you gotta have a certain rhythm," he said.

Uthoff said the Columbian had great success with their jazz shows last year, so they started a series for this season. She spotted the Scamps playing at the Corporate Woods Jazz Festival last summer.

"If you want traditional jazz, these are the guys to call," Uthoff said.

► FRESHMEN

PILOTS helps new students adjust

■ Program offers students tips to succeed in academics

Katie Thomas
staff reporter

Freshmen at K-State are learning to fly.

"We're taking freshmen and teaching them how to fly, how to navigate on their own and take off when the year is done," Anita Cortez, PILOTS program coordinator, said.

PILOTS is not about flying in the blue skies, but about flying high in the academic skies.

The program helps freshmen organize their core classes. Students take one communication class, one math class and one social science class. The students are also enrolled in a University Experience class and a PILOTS communication lab.

The University Experience class offers support for the core classes the students are taking. It gives them the opportunity to go over the material from the lecture and get help for studying for exams in smaller groups, Cortez said.

"I see the program as a program that fosters freshmen excellence," she said.

Students are self-selected for the program on the basis of American Collegiate Testing program scores at summer orientation, Cortez said.

PILOTS is being used to increase freshmen retention, which is a national problem for universities, Cortez said.

"K-State wanted to address that issue: How do we get freshmen to turn into sophomores?" she said.

About 100 students have chosen to participate in this year's program.

"I felt it would help me have a less stressful freshman year," said Jaquetta

Carter, freshman in pre-veterinary medicine and pre-medicine.

Carter said she liked the smaller classes because she learned the material better.

The communication lab is for any writing assignments the students have. Learning to write is an important part of the program, Cortez said.

The faculty working with the program have worked writing into all of the classes. For example, in the math class, students write a paper about a famous mathematician, Cortez said.

Carter said the teachers involved in the program are also helpful.

Cortez said the communication lab is open for students at night.

"Students can use it as a quiet study area," she said.

There are various types of study options available. Because the students are taking similar classes, they can study in groups with other PILOTS students. They can also study alone, Cortez said.

"They probably don't know what the commitment to study time will be," she said.

Good study habits are one thing Eric Waters, sophomore in graphic design and PILOT participant last year, said he had learned and was putting to use. Waters participated in the program last year.

"It made me get a better focus on my priorities as a student," he said.

In addition to classroom studies, the PILOTS program also encourages students to be involved in extracurricular activities, Cortez said.

"We believe the more the students get involved, the more successful they will be," she said.

► INTERNATIONAL

Information available at Union for study abroad programs

Holly McConkey
staff reporter

Traveling the world is a seemingly unattainable dream for many students.

The K-State study abroad program is giving students a chance to ask questions about their dream from 11:15 to 1:15 p.m. at an information table in the K-State Student Union. The table will be set up today, Oct. 23 and 24.

Students can get applications and other information about study abroad at the table, said Jennifer Feller, graduate student intern for International Programs.

Application deadlines are approaching for the study abroad opportunities available through International Programs, she said.

Nikki Isemann, interim International Programs director, said students can go almost anywhere in the world for a pretty affordable price through study abroad.

"Often, you just pay for what you do here. The only difference is travel expenses," she said.

If students are interested in studying abroad, the first thing they should do is make an appointment with the International Programs office to get help deciding what program is best for them.

International Programs offers a browsing library that has a box of materials on each individual program and country, Isemann said.

One of the many study abroad programs K-State has to offer is the International Student Exchange Program. The ISEP allows students to choose from more than 100 colleges and universities worldwide.

Students can also choose to study at a school that specializes in their field of study, Isemann said.

Isemann said she believes studying abroad is beneficial for students.

"It gives you a perspective on another culture. It teaches you something about yourself. It's an eye-opener," she said. "Putting it on a résumé also makes you more competitive with other applicants."

There will be international students that are here on exchange from abroad and K-State students who have been abroad at the table, she said.

Angelique Courbou, exchange student from France, will be one of the students at the table to talk to interested students.

She said she has had great experience with International Programs.

"Anytime you have a problem, or if you feel homesick, there is always someone in the office to talk to," she said.

Courbou said she has had such a good experience here, after she went home, she decided to return to K-State.

Feller said International Programs is trying to do an outreach to students by going into language classes and sending out informational flyers.

"We want to inform students to go to the information meetings we are having in the evenings," she said.

There will be two informational meetings at the International Programs office today at 7:30 p.m., and at 6:30 p.m. Oct. 24.

There are also scholarships available for students who need financial help while studying abroad.

Isemann said some scholarships are for specific programs and some are general and can go toward any program. The scholarships range from $250-500. The deadline for scholarships through Student Financial Assistance is Feb. 1.

The study abroad application deadline is tentatively set for Nov. 30 for International Programs, other than the Germany and Switzerland Exchange, which is Nov. 3.

Black activist opposes march due to sexism

■ Angela Davis says Million Man March is step backward for women

Associated Press

NEW YORK — Even though she understands the appeal of the Million Man March, black activist Angela Davis says she cannot support it because it excludes women.

"No march, movement or agenda that defines manhood in the narrowest terms and seeks to make women lesser partners in this quest for equality can be considered a positive step," Davis said Friday, speaking on behalf of African-American Agenda 2000, a group formed in opposition to the march.

Davis acknowledged the attraction of the march at a time when opportunities for black men are so limited and violence, drugs, poverty and crime are so widespread.

But she added, "There are ways of understanding black masculinity that do not rely on subjugating women."

The man organizing the march, the controversial Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan, has described the event planned for today in Washington, D.C., as a day of atonement for black men who continue the abuse of women that our slave owners put in motion.

He has also said the march will give black men an opportunity to resume some of their responsibilities as breadwinners and community leaders — burdens Farrakhan believes black women have unfairly had to shoulder.

although some women have enthusiastically supported the all-male endeavor, Marcia Gillespie, editor in chief of Ms. magazine, appeared with Davis and several other prominent black women and said such support is misguided.

"They are stepping up to a patriarchal vision that automatically says black men are the leaders and that women's place and role is with the children, frying the chicken, providing medical assistance when needed and writing a poem. I don't think so," said Gillespie.

Although the march was planned and promoted specifically as a way to bring black men together,

Ben Chavis, who is helping Farrakhan organize the event, told CNN on Friday: "If a black woman shows up, she will be given respect. She will be allowed to join the assembly."

"Will she be excluded? The answer is no," he added.

Historian and author Paula Giddings, who is also part of the African-American Agenda 2000, said the group is concerned not only about Farrakhan's sexism, but also his anti-Semitism, his anti-gay remarks and what she termed his "anti-Catholicism and anti-black Christian ministers."

Giddings said Farrakhan's growing influence bodes ill for blacks who want to build bridges. "On Tuesday, he will emerge as one of the most influential spokesmen of black America," she added.

"I want to know where the other leaders are," said Jewell Jackson McCabe, founder of the Coalition of 100 Black Women, an organization of business executives and other professionals.

have rewritten the Bible to fit their beliefs, Curry said. They pick the weak for the enemy and use emotional fears as a basis to fuel their powerful political machine.

The homosexual community must not show division within itself, or it will only aid the radical Christian case, he said.

The Kansas sodomy law in relation to recent events at Gage Park in Topeka and a Colorado case that is now in the Supreme Court are examples of the importance of educating others about the radical Christian's agenda.

Gay men are being arrested for solicitation in Gage Park, Curry said. One person has challenged the Topeka ordinance as singling out homosexuals.

The definition used in the Topeka solicitation ordinance comes from the Kansas State Annotated 21-3505 state statute, Curry said.

The statute defines sodomy as "oral or anal copulation between persons who are not husband and wife or consenting members of the opposite sex."

"Apparently the legislature literally interpreted homosexuality as the love which dare not speak its name," Curry said. "So we're left with the fact that sodomy only applies to people who are of the same sex."

The case of Bowers v. Hardwick was decided in 1984 by the Supreme Court, in regards to the Georgia sodomy law. That law was ruled constitutional, but unlike the Kansas law, it equally applied to both heterosexuals and homosexuals, Curry said.

The Kansas case is now being heard at the appellate level in the state court system. The case is going through the Kansas courts because they tend to interpret the 14th Amendment, which says "no person shall be denied equal protection of the law by any state," more broadly than the federal government, Curry said.

The case Romer v. Evans, which deals with Colorado's Second Amendment, is at the Supreme Court level. The case deals with a statewide referendum in Colorado that basically strips gays and lesbians of all rights.

"After oral arguments Tuesday, it looks like if the vote were taken today, the Supreme Court would probably issue a ruling that would be 6-3 in our favor," Curry said.

Rodger Belyea, freshman in psychology, said he agreed that little things help change people's attitudes. He said you don't need to become a lawyer to change the laws, but do things like coming out as homosexual to friends and classmates.

"If I come out to somebody as an individual, it affects them as an individual rather than just saying there are homosexuals out there," Belyea said.

"Instead, you can say that there is one right next to you."

whether they can understand the words.

"The reason I came here was because it is a part of our culture we don't have at the moment. As Hispanics, we're away from home," Perez said. "This is actually a family away from family."

People from diverse backgrounds came out to enjoy the festivities.

"On no other night can you find such a mixture of people from different backgrounds," Manuri Nakkawita, sophomore in advertising, said. "There are African Americans, Hispanics and foreign students from everywhere. They're all here."

Vivian Ferguson, junior in theater, said the event provided a good opportunity for people to experience another culture.

"A lot of people at K-State have not been out of Kansas. It's good for them to experience an event like this," she said.

"There is a lot more to the world than Manhattan, Kansas. Maybe something like this will encourage people to travel outside their comfort zone."

WEEK

There were also more conversations about the events in classrooms, Mary Renee Smith, freshman in public relations, said.

"Those who cared paid attention. We aren't going to change everyone in a week," Smith said.

Charlene Smith, attorney and Washburn University professor, spoke Oct. 11 and drew the largest crowd, Nelson said.

The BGSL group decided to offer the same speech at 12:30 and 7 p.m. during the week. The scheduling was done this way to make the seminars more accessible to everyone, Nelson said.

Straight allies, those who support BGSL but are heterosexual, attended a lot of the events during the week as well, Nelson said.

"Opposition was very minimal this year," Nelson said.

A few questions were asked of speaker Denise Leopold, minister of Metropolitan Community Church of Manhattan and Manhattan AIDS project board member, Nelson said.

Leopold gave a speech called "The Church and Homosexuality: From Blessing to Condemnation?" on Oct. 12.

The purpose of the week was to help individuals discover their personal sexual orientation, understand others sexual orientation and to get information out to those on campus about gays, lesbians and bisexuals, Nelson said.

Reno to deliver Landon Lecture

Nicole Kirby
staff reporter

U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno is considering K-State's invitation to deliver a Landon Lecture Oct. 24.

Charles Reagan, chair of the Landon Lecture committee, said he does not expect a confirmation until a few days before the lecture is scheduled.

The committee extended an invitation to Reno about a year ago. And although she has not confirmed the engagement, Reagan said the committee will proceed with lecture arrangements.

"She indicated that she would like to accept," Reagan said.

Reno is the first woman Attorney General

Reno has participated in hearings on the Ruby Ridge incident, where political activist Randy Weaver's wife and son were killed in a shoot out with the FBI. According to the Oct. 2 issue of Time magazine, Reno suspended FBI Deputy Director Larry Potts as a result of the incident.

She also recently recommended the Washington Post comply with the Unabomber's demands to print his manifesto, which the paper did in order to protect public safety.

Earlier this year, Reno was involved in investigations into the dealings of Transportation Secretary Federico Pena, who was accused of unfairly giving a contract to the firm that he used to work for.

Reno said there was no credible evidence that Pena had actually broken any laws.

She has also conducted investigations into the actions of other politicians such as Housing Secretary Henry Cisneros and Commerce Secretary Ron Brown.

Reno has also been looking into juvenile crime and arrests, which she said may double within the next 15 years. She advocates early intervention programs for children.

Reno's lecture topic has not been determined, Reagan said.

Group goals include reflection, unity

Sarah Lunday
campus editor

Crowded into a dark room, watching Louis Farrakhan speak on C-Span, more than 100 black students embraced black unity Monday.

"It was a time to reflect on ourselves, look at ourselves and define ourselves," said Gemini Pankey, political issues coordinator for Black Student Union.

K-State's BSU-sponsored Million Man March included voter registration, a candlelight vigil and watching the speech by Farrakhan, Nation of Islam and organizer of the march. The purpose of the campus and nationwide Million Man March was to enable and encourage black men in America to take a greater responsibility and play a role in uplifting their families and race, Pankey said.

"The day got people to come out and reflect on one idea and tried to get ideas to better the community," said Colette McLemore, public relations coordinator for BSU.

People involved focused on concerns within the black community and the idea of blacks being a divided race, Pankey said.

"I guess from the nation and the school, I felt a lot of unity," McLemore said.

Michael Bell, sophomore in architecture, said he had a great time during the day and saw it as a day of atonement.

Black men and women viewed the day as a holy day of atonement, said James Boyer, professor of curriculum and American ethnic studies.

It is a holy day held to enrich and bring people back together, Boyer said. Muslims, Christians, Jews and people who don't subscribe to a particular religion were at the March Monday, Boyer said.

"The atonement was to reach out to anybody, whether you are a black brother, 'slave owner' or anyone else," he said.

Boyer said America still has institutionalized "slave owners."

Car scam fools Kansans

Brent Johnson
staff reporter

Don't always believe in mail-in contests.

Many residents in northeast Kansas have received phony contest certificates declaring them winners of a 1995 Buick Regal, said Joyce Woodard, Better Business Bureau president.

The documents were professionally done, so many people said they believed they won a new car, she said.

However, there is a catch.

The contest requires all winners to send $22.87 to a New York address to receive their prizes.

"People are honestly believing they are winning," Woodard said. "The common law with any contest is if you have to mail in money, you haven't won anything."

Woodard said this scam has caused problems for Kansas residents.

"We have no way of telling exactly how many people have received these certificates," she said, "but we've had more than 125 people call or come in wanting to know more about this contest and the company."

The company asks for the payment to be made by check. The only way for people to get their money back is to cancel the check before the company cashes it.

"We've had instances where consumers have stopped payment on their checks before they go through," Woodard said.

The problem is by the time consumers realize the scam, it's too late.

The Better Business Bureau said it has had problems with this company before.

"I can't give the current name of the company, but we've had problems with them before," Woodard said. "This same company is now operating under its sixth name."

The company has functioned with five different names. Each time people catch on to the scam the company changes its name, she said.

"Paying $22.87 for an opportunity to win a car seems great to many Kansans. If you multiply $22.87 and the number of people who have replied to this contest, the New York company is making lots of money, Woodard said.

"This New York company is running a really healthy business in Kansas," Woodard said.

Josh Hilgers, sophomore in biology, said he doesn't believe most mail-in contests, except for Publisher's Clearing House.

"I usually throw away most junk mail," he said, "but I think that Ed McMahon is for real. They've got the van,

UPC-sponsored bus packs fans off to Nebraska

Jonathan Yeomans
staff reporter

Union Program Council is helping the Wildcats fight the Cornhuskers this Saturday by bringing a bus load of 42 Wildcat fans to Lincoln, Neb.

The UPC chartered bus trip, which leaves Friday, was sold out during the first 15 minutes of ticket sales.

"We started selling tickets at 7:15 a.m. Oct. 4," Cece Ridder, adviser for UPC travel, said. "We started advertising and promoting the trip with flyers and posters two weeks prior to ticket sales."

KQLA-FM 103.5 will be riding along and participating in the UPC sponsored trip.

"They gave away two tickets on the radio this week," Ridder said.

"They'll be doing giveaways and K-State trivia type things on the trip. It kind of makes the trip a little more fun."

Two radio stations from Lincoln also invited the UPC group to a pre-game party two hours before the game.

"It's up to the group to have a consensus on whether or not we go to this or not," Ridder said.

Brad Newitt and Ridder, UPC sponsors, said students can bring food and drinks onto the bus.

"On the way down everyone can bring coolers on the bus," Ridder said.

"There is no alcohol allowed, but I'm not going to search their coolers or anything like that."

Overpopulation may cripple planet

Karrin Thomas
staff reporter

Failure to address the world population issue will result in deforestation, ozone depletion, global warming and overpopulation in the 21st century, said Werner Fornos, director of the World Population Institute.

Werner Fornos delivered his lecture, "Gaining People, Losing Ground," Monday night to about 150 people in Forum Hall in the K-State Student Union.

Fornos said the world's population is now 5.7 billion people, and it is expected to double in less than 40 years. Most of the growth occurs in the poorest parts of the world.

He said the expanding need for resources will mean further environmental degradation.

"If we don't make the necessary course changes, we may look back at this time in our lives in anger and dismay at the habitat we have lost forever," he said. "Our forests are declining, our topsoil is eroding, our deserts are expanding, our planet is heating up and the ozone layer, the protective layer of skin over the earth, is thinning."

Fornos proposed the eradication of female illiteracy, full employment opportunities with pay for women, a reduction in the infant mortality rate to its lowest level and universal access to family planning as four ways to help slow population growth.

"When I say family planning, I mean natural methods of family planning and modern medical methods of family planning," he said.

"Making sure that couples know how to prevent unwanted pregnancies is the ultimate democratic solution."

Fornos said abortion is not a form of family planning but is a failure to come to grips with a much more fundamental problem.

SUPREME COURT REJECTS FREE-SPEECH APPEAL BY PRO-LIFE ACTIVISTS

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court handed pro-life activists yet another defeat Monday, rejecting a free-speech appeal by California pickets arrested for parading too near an abortion doctor's home.

The court, acting without comment, turned away arguments that a San Jose ordinance used against 16 pro-life demonstrators unlawfully interfered with their freedom of expression.

The ordinance imposes a 300-foot buffer zone in banning demonstrations that target pri-ivate residences.

Although the action was not a decision and therefore set no precedent, it extended abortion foes' recent high court losing streak.

Earlier this month, the court rejected a sweeping challenge to federal limits on abortion-clinic protests. The justices let stand rulings in a Virginia case that said the federal Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act does not infringe on anyone's freedom of expression or religion.

The court had rejected a similar challenge to the FACE law in June.

In the last year, the court also turned away appeals by pro-life activists who said they are being wrongly sued as racketeers in their efforts to stop women from having abortions.

CASTING ANGERS ARGENTINES

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina (AP) — As if an unflattering Broadway play weren't enough: Now Hollywood's plan to cast Madonna as Evita Peron has Argentina crying for its legendary first lady.

The president is outraged.

The archbishop calls it blasphemy. A local filmmaker has launched his own production, with official support, to set the record straight.

"Evita was a pioneering feminist, not the prostitute others would have you believe," movie producer Victor Bo said.

Bo's film, to be called "Evita: The True Story," is backed by President Carlos Menem, who is a Peronist, and will feature a squeaky-voiced Argentine soap opera star, Andrea del Boca. Production is to begin in March.

While the Broadway musical "Evita" painted the second and most famous wife of dictator Juan Peron as a corrupt populist who slept her way to power, the Argentine production will promote her image as a champion of the masses.

To many Argentines, Eva Peron was nothing less than a saint.

They didn't take kindly to the Broadway musical, which was banned in Argentina. And for many of the former first lady's fervent admirers, casting Madonna in a film version of "Evita" only adds insult to injury.

"A total and utter disgrace," President Menem said.

The Argentine version, he said, will be "a film about the real Evita, not like one of those fakes people who know nothing about her life have been making."

Free stuff and Velcro Olympics are waiting for students at the Life-O-Matic Tour. Between classes, from 11 a.m. and 4 p.m. today, students can sample products and participate in activities at the free-speech zone in front of Seaton Hall.

"Collegiate Advantage, a marketing company out of Boston, sponsors the event," said Sarah Hadley, acting program director of Union Programming Council.

The purpose of the tour is to boost the reputation of the tour's corporate sponsors, she said.

"They contacted us about bringing the tour to K-State, and it is of no charge to us," Hadley said.

The nationwide Life-O-Matic tour began Aug. 25, and is scheduled to visit 25 college campuses.

"We wanted to create a fun atmosphere for students and let the sponsors show their products and get their names out — plus it's free for the students," Colin Cadogan, tour manager, said.

The title sponsors are Mademoiselle and Details magazine. Other sponsors are Dodge, General Foods, Sprint, Discover, Diet Coke, Pier 1 Imports and First USA, Cadogan said.

"Life-O-Matic is a new section in Mademoiselle that is geared to college students," he said.

The tour offers students a fun activity, Hadley said.

Throughout the day, there will be constant activity, stage-event games and sponsor giveaways, Cadogan said.

Some fun activities are the Velcro Olympics sponsored by Sprint, the Dodge remote control car course, virtual reality and sumo wrestling, he said.

"There are lots of things going on, lots of stuff to give away, so come down and take it from us," he said.

Students drank free coffee from General Foods, took free samples of magazines and browsed the booths throughout the day.

"This is our first time at K-State and it's a great location, it is a great time," Cadogan said.

Joel Krause, freshman in chemical engineering and math, was the winner of Monday's balloon toss.

"It is awesome and I won a lot of prizes," Krause said. "The activities give us a cool way to spend an hour between classes."

Velcro Olympics caught the eyes of many students.

"The steep walls of the Velcro Olympics were tiring but it was fun," Katie Busenbark, sophomore undecided, said.

"Today was fun and something different, plus we get free things," she said.

in our opinion

Million Man March inspires unity, atonement

Through the participation that could be seen in Washington, D.C. and on the K-State campus, it could be assumed there had been as much interest in the event around the country.

The Million Man March showed the country the pride and unity of the black community with the strength of its numbers.

In Washington, D.C. and at K-State, black men and women turned out for this day of atonement to help heal the wounds in the black community and show support for one another.

These ideals are all too often forgotten in our society, and a large demonstration of these values is to be applauded.

The concept of healing of the black community was highly valued before the march — and rightly so.

The tragedies that have befallen the black community have reached epidemic proportions.

Although racial harmony surely must be the ultimate goal of our society and our world as a whole, the diversity and separatism in our individual groups must be overcome if true racial harmony can ever hope to be attained.

This is a big step in the black community's effort toward this goal.

The Million Man March can be deemed a success.

Through the participation that could be seen in Washington, D.C., and on the K-State campus, it could be assumed there had been as much interest in the event around the country.

It is a proud day for blacks and people of all races when people can be witnessed joining together in such large numbers to encourage the betterment of themselves and their culture.

Hopefully, this will not be merely a token effort.

But instead, we should view this march as a step in easing the division in the black community and tension between all races.

▶ HOMOSEXUALITY A SIN

Editor,

I am writing concerning the article in Friday's paper about the early church and homosexuality.

I would be interested to know which version of the Bible Denise Leopold read.

The one thing I do agree with her on is we should love our neighbor.

However, if my neighbor has a stumbling block in her life, it is my duty as a follower of Christ to speak the truth in love to that person concerning her sin, whether it is homosexuality, pride or whatever.

God is the same yesterday, today and forever.

You can't pick and choose from the Word. It is clearly stated in the Old and New Testaments that homosexuality is an abomination to God. God hasn't changed since the beginning of time.

I doubt He's going to do so because we're a liberated society.

This is the same God who destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah because of their perversity.

God is merciful and just. For the sake of only 10 righteous people he would have spared the populations of two cities.

The 10 weren't found, and the cities were destroyed while the righteous escaped. I do not doubt there were homosexuals in the time of Christ, because there is nothing new under the sun.

This doesn't prove to me homosexuality is right; it proves no matter how many chances God gives humanity, we're still going to screw up if we try to take matters into our own hands.

The homosexuals in the early church were in sin just like the homosexuals today.

Homosexuality is not an unforgivable sin, but it is still a sin.

God loves everyone, but if you are unrepentant, He can have no part of you because He can have no part in sin.

Leopold, if you want to condone homosexuality there is nothing I can do to stop you, but please don't twist the Bible to suit your own purposes.

▶ CHILD-CARE OBLIGATIONS

Editor,

There has been talk recently about offering child care at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex so students with children won't have to find babysitters every time they go there.

During this talk, the claim has been made that not all students have equal access to the Rec because child care isn't offered.

This is a load.

All students are offered equal access to the Rec.

Whether you have a child, we're all admitted to the Rec under the same policies.

If we all had children, we may all have the same problem of finding child care while we exercised, but we would all experience this problem equally.

The Rec doesn't discriminate against parents.

When you have a child, you take on responsibilities. One of these is finding somebody to look after your child if you are occupied with some other task.

This responsibility belongs to the parents, not society in general.

If students who are parents want child care offered at the Rec, then by all means ask for this service. I'm sure it would offer invaluable help to certain individuals.

It is, however, offensive when people scream discrimination.

It's one thing to ask for help and another thing to demand it. It is not the Rec's obligation to offer child care.

I'm sure this issue will be considered based on all of the interest that I keep reading about.

Just remember one thing: If the Rec ends up not offering child care, it is not discrimination.

U. S. plagued by subtle tendencies toward fascism

I, for one, am fairly glad Hitler and Mussolini lost World War II. The fascist doctrines they espoused would be terrible to live under.

For this reason, I am increasingly worried about the political climate in this country. If the recent trends are any indication, the United States is becoming increasingly fascist.

Webster's dictionary defines fascism as "forcible suppression of the opposition, the retention of private ownership of the means of production, belligerent nationalism and racism and glorification of war."

In a recent Utne Reader article, Umberto Eco goes even further in trying to define fascism. Eco lays out several defining traits of what makes up or lays the ground work for a fascist society.

One of the first traits would be what Eco calls the cult of tradition. Many fascists appeal to such things as traditional family values and outdated text to explain what is wrong or missing in the world.

As Eco said,

there can be no new learning, because "truth already has been spelled out once and for all, and we can only keep interpreting its obscure message."

Another trait of fascism is being irrational. Fascists will take things that are good or advantageous to the world and blame the problems of the world on those things.

For instance, integration of the schools was a good thing. Under a fascist mindset, however, this is seen as being responsible for many of the problems of the modern world.

Fascists are also against any kind of critical thinking. Intellectuals are distrusted or scoffed at. Many fascists would rather believe a blow-hard comedian than a whole body of scientific data.

A fascist leader is rarely questioned by followers. For them, disagreement is treason.

Eco also points to the fear of difference many fascists have. For instance, a fascist will look at an immigrant as a threat or a burden on society. They can't see the benefits in the diversity an immigrant brings with them, therefore, they try to lock them out.

This lack of diversity is very important to a fascist. They would much prefer there be only one language in their country.

An appeal to a frustrated middle class is a big draw of the fascist cause. If the middle class is feeling economic hardship, a fascist is likely to take the approach of blaming the lower class. Instead of addressing the real issues, a fascist will scapegoat certain people.

The scapegoat is usually from the lower classes, because fascists have contempt for the weak. If a person has not done as well as the fascist, it must be because of some inherent defect in that person.

If, however, fascists are the ones not doing well, it must be because of some plot being hatched against them. Many times they will see the government as the source of this plot and thereby feel justified in trying to take it over by force.

Struggle is seen as being a key element of life for the fascist. For this reason, peace would be detrimental to them. They must constantly prepare for warfare, even if no real enemy is on the horizon. Of course, all this preparation makes them want to test their muscle, so enemies are conveniently created.

Finally, fascists favor putting themselves in the position of representing the people. They say the people have spoken.

Usually, however, the people haven't really spoken, because they are either intimidated or apathetic.

Perhaps, although I hope not, it isn't clear to you why I am worried about the growth of fascism in the good ol' land of the free. Therefore, I will point out some of the things I am talking about.

Notice how the concept of traditional family values and ideals that built this country are tossed around in many political campaigns. Traditional family values involve a male-dominated household, and the original ideals of this country only involved white, male land owners.

Notice, too, the lack of respect for science. Science tells us the way we are treating the planet is very harmful, and self-appointed experts casually dismiss all of this as bull. The problem is that many people believe these self-appointed experts.

Pete Wilson, California Governor and Republican presidential candidate, supported the anti-immigrant Proposition 187. Wilson also pushed for the elimination of affirmative action in California.

Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan. and Republican presidential candidate, is now pushing for English to be the official language. What an insult to diversity.

If the people have spoken, it is not for the reforms being pushed in Congress. In the last election, according to the Utne Reader, 36 million people voted Republican.

Thirty-four million votes went the other way.

There are, however, 193 million people of voting age and 129 million registered to vote. If any people have spoken it is these, who were too disgusted or apathetic to cast a vote for either party.

We defeated fascism in WWII. Let's not let it defeat us this time.

Lach Franquemont is a sophomore in physics and philosophy.

Urinal design marks ultimate in human achievement

Look on the works of man, and tell me this is order."

This statement, sexist language and all, came from my roommate Dave, who was trying to refute the claim that life is an anti-entropic force.

Dave thinks, far from creating order, humanity's destiny is to accelerate entropy by blowing everything up.

"That's why we have brains," Dave said.

Dave's wrong, though. Human life does create, although only in the realm of ideas. We create information. Information can't break down; it can only be lost.

Humans might blow everything up, but that's OK. Western civilization reached its peak. We have achieved our greatest achievement:

The Sloan (T.M.) auto-flush urinal.

Nobody believes me when I say that, but it's true. Homer, Euclid, Galileo, Newton, Shakespeare, Mozart and Einstein were all simply foundation for the Sloan design team.

Fire, the wheel, the telescope, penicillin, the atom bomb and Hollywood were all rising action. Sexist as it may be, the Sloan auto-flush urinal is the climax. The rest of our time on this planet is all denouement.

Let's face it, our clock is running out. Unlike Dave, I don't think the human race is going to go out with a bang. I think we are going to sit back and enjoy it.

Zanex, Clomipramine and Lithium.

As these drugs become more advanced and effective, people will stop caring about advancing civilization. We'll just kick back, pop a few more pills, and be happier than any generation before us.

Lots of perfectly reasonable people think this is a nightmare scenario, but I don't share this narrow view of the world.

What is our goal in life, if not to be happy? Why bother with religion, wealth or television when happiness is just a caplet away?

Take, for example, Clomipramine. A significant number of Clomipramine users have, once cured of their depression, asked to stay on the drug. It's not because they're addicted, but because they have discovered a splendid side effect to the drug:

For many Clomipramine users, yawning causes orgasms.

How can you beat that? It's only a matter of time before somebody like myself (only smarter and more industrious) manages to isolate the psychoactive agent that causes this side effect and synthesizes a drug that has this effect on 100 percent of the population. After that, the only rational thing to do is to put it in the water supply.

How will ethnic groups find the will to fight about this land or that land in Bosnia if they orgasm every time they yawn?

Why would street gangs peddle crack and pull drive-bys when a simple yawn will be so much more rewarding?

Again, lots of people will think this is a truly awful idea. They'll say we'll stop educating, stop learning, stop working, stop reproducing.

I say, yep, true, have some more water. (Once they try it, I'm sure they'll change their tune.)

What would be so bad about yawning our way to oblivion? It would be a damn sight better than nuclear disaster, or a mutated ebola plague.

This is the twilight of mankind, and I am ready to yawn my way into the darkness. But first, as everyone else is enjoying their own special yawns, I and a band of dedicated followers will go to the moon.

Funded by whomever makes the new-improved yawn drug (who will be very rich by then, and is bound to sympathize with my cause), I will build a gargantuan monument in Sea of Tranquility.

I will build, as humanity's tombstone, a 100-mile high Sloan auto-flush urinal. To the race of intelligent cockroaches that comes after us, it will be a god. To "advanced" beings from Sirius who eventually visit earth, however, it will be a statement. "We did something with our civilization," it will proclaim to the extra-terrestrials. "We made it!"

Stress

As mid-terms are peaking, tensions rise.
Acupuncture and massage therapy can help relieve the stress. — By Sera L. Tank

You have three tests this week, a 12-page paper due and a speech to give in front of 200 people.

Yes, mid-term stress is upon all of us, but there are some things you can do and places you can go to help relieve it a bit.

Arthur Rathbun, a counselor at University Counseling Services, said one thing students can do to receive the pre-test stress is to study.

"A lot of students are stressed out because they're not prepared for tests," he said. "In that case, they are rightfully stressed out."

Rathbun said another reason students feel anxious during test time is because they overwhelm themselves with things to do.

"Instead of studying on a regular basis, they cram. Cramming is less effective," he said. "They should manage their study time over the course of the whole semester."

But if students are really having difficulties, they can go to Counseling Services on the second floor of Lafene Health Center.

Rathbun said the counselors can help students get through anxious test times with stress-management procedures.

Another, less traditional, way to alleviate stress is acupuncture.

Mark Hatesohl, a chiropractor and acupuncturist in Manhattan, said acupuncture focuses on different points of the body to relieve stress.

"It helps your muscles to relax. For instance, there are points along the wrist to help with stage fright, giving speeches and getting up in front of people to talk," Hatesohl said.

Hatesohl said there are several types of acupuncture besides the traditional needles poking into the skin as we see on television. Other types are electrical, laser, finger pressure and teishin, which is a ballpoint pen-like device with a spring to press on the body's pressure points.

Hatesohl said there are several things students can do on their own to relieve study stress.

"Get some exercise. Roll your shoulders. Take a walk," he said. "Take a break to get out of that hunched-over studying position."

Students are turning to massage therapy more and more as a way of relieving stress, said Sandy Snyder, a massage therapist at Essential Massage in Manhattan.

"It isn't just a luxury anymore. It's not just for relaxation. It really helps the muscles," Snyder said. "And it's so relieving for shoulders and the neck. We have students come in with problems with migraines."

Snyder said stress absolutely destroys the body's cells.

"Massage therapy helps with that. You go into the muscle deeply, and it helps with the regenerative process by opening up blood flow and oxygen flow to the brain," she said.

There are some problems students can help themselves with, but Snyder said stress isn't something someone can fix on their own, usually.

"Stress usually concentrates in the neck and shoulders," she said. "It's hard for people to reach back there."

For people who don't have much time to go get a massage, Essential Massage has just started offering what are called spot massages or mini massages, which are massages that can be done in 15 or 30 minute increments, Snyder said.

Herbal remedies are another way to go.

According to Herbs and Health: An Introductory Guide to Herbal Health Care, there are some alternatives to stress and anxiety through herbs and herbal teas.

People can try such herbs as valerian and passion flower, kava kava and eleuthero (also known as Siberian ginseng) can aide in ridding yourself of tension.

Jacque Jones, junior in interior design, said she thinks one reason students have a lot of stress around mid-term time is because they procrastinate.

"I think that you should get a lot done early. Do it slowly and at a steady pace," she said. "Schedule it out so it's not such a big load at one time."

Leann Brandt, freshman in music education, said looking at papers, tests, classes and projects individually keeps her from feeling overwhelmed.

"Take everything separately. Deal with each of their midterms individually and don't try to deal with everything at once," she said.

Jeremy Brewer, sophomore in secondary education, said stepping away from his studies every so often is helpful to him.

"I take a study break about once every hour and a half. I go out to get a pizza or talk to friends," he said. "Sometimes the study breaks last longer than the actual studying does."

PHILLIPS' STATUS

Coach Tom Osborne said he hopes that University of Nebraska officials will announce a decision this week on the status of running back Lawrence Phillips.

"My thinking was that they were going to try to do something this week, make some statement as to where Lawrence stood with the university," Osborne said Monday.

The Collegian will offer a comprehensive look at the K-State men's basketball team.

Some hints before the big
NU game

OK, it's all right. Everyone can let out that sigh of relief now. Oh, our beloved Wildcats, they just love to keep us in suspense.

The Cats looked less than impressive in their 23-17 defeat over the Oklahoma State Cowboys. And what did Coach Bill Snyder have to say about his team's performance?

"We're only as good as we need to be, I guess," Snyder said.

Well, Coach, you're going to have to be a lot better this weekend if you want a slight chance of winning, I guess.

In Saturday's game against Oklahoma State, the Cats gave up 257 yards in rushing, including a 91-yard dash by David Thompson.

That's just not going to cut it against the No. 2 (should be No. 1) team in the nation, the Nebraska Cornhuskers.

The key to beating the Cornhuskers Saturday will be stopping the run. The second-most important thing for the Cats will be stopping the run.

Do you get the picture? The Cornhuskers are No. 1 in the nation in rushing offense, averaging 466.3 yards a game. Freshman Ahman Green is fourth in the Big 8 in rushing, averaging 102.5 yards a game.

But even more dangerous than Green will be the presence of quarterback Tommie Frazier. All Frazier did on Saturday was rush for 71 yards and three touchdowns against Missouri.

A play I guarantee will be seen throughout the day against the Cats will be the option.

It will be crucial for the Cat defense to contain this play. We all saw how bad the Cats got burned last year by the option run by the Colorado Buffaloes.

If the Cat defense can stop or at least contain the Cornhusker rushing attack, then a Cat victory is highly probable. I say this because the Cornhuskers are not a passing team.

The Cornhuskers rank fifth in the Big 8 in passing offense at just 159.7 yards a game. Nebraska doesn't have one receiver who cracks the top 10 in Big 8 reception leaders.

If Nebraska has to go to the air, the Cats' secondary will be up to the task. In fact, I feel that they will dominate the Cornhusker passing attack.

The Cats are first in the Big 8 and second in the nation in passing defense efficiency, allowing just 630 yards passing. So, please Nebraska, feel free to go to the air on Saturday.

On the other side of the ball, the Cats' offense will have to be diversified. The Cats will have to be able to do what they did against OSU in the passing department — that is, spread the ball to many receivers. Saturday, Matt Miller spread the ball to five different receivers for more than 260 yards.

But even more important for Miller and the passing attack will be the running game. If the Cats' running game can get established from the beginning, then the passing game will open up.

Another thing the Cats will need on Saturday will be aggressive play calling.

Can someone please tell me who was impersonating Snyder on the sidelines against OSU? I don't know, and I don't care, as long as that same person is there against the Cornhuskers.

I absolutely loved the Cats going for fourth down six times against OSU. Even better was that the Cats made it five times. The Cats need to let it all hang out on Saturday, so Snyder, or whoever is down there on the sidelines, don't be afraid to take some gambles.

There's one last reason why the Cats have a good chance at winning in Lincoln, Neb. The Cats haven't beat Nebraska since a 12-0 upset on the Cornhuskers Homecoming in 1968. Nebraska's Homecoming this year is Oct. 21 against K-State.

▶ SOFTBALL

Wildcats split doubleheader, now seek varsity statusDan Lewerenz
sports editor

The K-State softball team may be new, but judging by its record this fall, it may be one of the most-improved teams on campus.

After winning only one of their 22 matchups last year in their inaugural season, the Wildcats have gone 7-7-2 this fall.

"We started the club last year with 22 games, including the tournaments," player/coach Terra Simonson said. "Most of the teams we played were junior colleges, and we only won one game."

"But this year we're shooting about .500," Simonson, a senior in English, said the increased organization that comes as the team develops has made practices and games more productive and helped the team improve.

"Our skills have improved with competition, especially on defense and our hitting technique," Simonson said. "We're a lot more aggressive than we were last year."

Pitcher/first base Angie Alexander, junior in feed science and management, said increased student participation has also helped the team.

"I think we've got more people than last year, and our practices are more organized," Alexander said.

Although 42 people showed up for the team's first meeting, only 16 are currently on the roster. Of those, 11 to 13 show up routinely for games, depending on individual schedules.

Alexander said the team has a hard time recruiting because of its status as a club sport.

"We can't really recruit people, because we don't have scholarships," Alexander said. "We usually hear about someone and ask them to 'play' — but anyone is welcome to come out."

One person who did come out is utility player Dawn Hamby, junior in advertising. Hamby played softball at Hutchinson Community College and joined K-State's team this year.

"My coach at Hutch juco told me about the team at K-State," Hamby said.

K-State's community college connection is solidified by the fact that the Cats play mostly community colleges. Simonson said playing community colleges increases K-State's visibility among players who may want to play at a four-year school.

Hamby said that playing community colleges also helps the team develop.

"It's good that we get to play both community colleges and four-year schools, and there's a lot of good community colleges out there," Hamby said. "Considering that we don't get to practice as much as a varsity team, it's good that we don't play four-year schools all the time."

Simonson, who will quit playing to coach full-time next semester, said K-State's program is moving in the right direction. The Cats were host to their first home games in the history of the club last Friday, splitting a doubleheader with Hutchinson Community College.

"Our home match was a big step for us," Simonson said.

Additionally, the team has been able to secure corporate sponsorship from the local owners of Subway.

"Subway has chipped in to the tune of about $1,000, which we can use for game balls, tournament entry fees and other game-related expenses," Simonson said. "They also gave us a huge banner."

Simonson said new opportunities brought on by the Big 12 Conference might help the softball team earn varsity status.

"I'm hoping that when K-State enters the Big 12, it will need more varsity sports," Simonson said. "By establishing a team and making a name for ourselves, we may be able to get picked up in the near future."

Oklahoma has one of the best women's softball teams in the country, and softball is really big in the Big 12."

Alexander said she agrees, adding that local and campus support could also help the team reach varsity status.

"I think that if people continue to support us, and people continue to play, the team could go varsity very quickly."

Northwestern Wildcats make a name in the college football world

Associated Press

EVANSTON, Ill. — Unbeaten atop the Big 10 standings with victories at Notre Dame and at Michigan and No. 11 in the national rankings.

That's Northwestern.

Yes, Northwestern.

How did a football program that hasn't had a winning season since Richard Nixon's first presidential term — a team that was 3-7-1 just a year ago — become a legitimate Rose Bowl contender?

"It's probably not anything so simple that you can pinpoint one or two or three reasons," said fourth-year coach Gary Barnett, whose Wildcats are 5-1 overall and 3-0 in the Big 10. "Success has a million fathers. Whoever wants credit can have it."

Barnett did offer a few concepts as keys to his team's sudden success, including coaching, trust, talent and playmaking.

"The most important thing has been continuity of the coaching staff," Barnett said. "Eight of the nine coaches have been here all four years, nine of nine for three years."

"This had been a place where assistant coaches just hung out and used the phone to get another job. You can't build a program that way. When I got here, the track record of assistant coaches was horrendous. Five different defensive coordinators and five different offensive coordinators in five years. We wanted to establish continuity."

With continuity came trust. The players knew the coaches would be there for them. This season, for the first time since Barnett arrived, most of the players were recruited by his staff.

Everybody asks what we're doing differently. We're not doing anything we haven't done — not one single thing. It's just that the players are playing better.

GARY BARNETT
NORTHWESTERN FOOTBALL COACH

"It's tough to keep focus when you're only winning three games a year," quarterback Steve Schnur said. "But even though our record did not improve in the early years, there was a change you could feel in the team. Only by being on the team could you experience that."

The Wildcats have maintained a levelheaded approach all season.

"We've been down, so some people expect us to get carried away. But we're out there to win games," safety Eric Collier said. "That's probably a reflection of Barnett's personality — not carrying him off the field, not throwing Gatorade on him."

Coaching and trust are great, Barnett said, but success ultimately comes down to the quality of the players and their ability to make big plays.

"Everybody asks what we're doing differently," Barnett said. "We're not doing anything we haven't done — not one single thing. We're saying the same things, we're coaching the same, we're working the same hours. It's just that the players are playing better."

"We've had guys in position before but they haven't always made the tackles, or they haven't listened to what's been said. Now we've got guys making plays. Part of it's the coaches, part of it's the players involved."

Long snapper Paul Janus' injury contributed to the shocking loss to Miami of Ohio, but the Wildcats have otherwise been healthy. And Northwestern ranks fifth nationally in turnover margin, with 16 take-aways and only six give-aways.

Though things have gone well for Northwestern, the Wildcats haven't been lucky. Nobody who saw the victories over Notre Dame and Michigan would suggest that Northwestern didn't deserve to win.

"A lot of people were going to doubt us," kicker Sam Valenzisi said. "If we were going to have people take us seriously, we had to play well."

Seriously, Rodney Ray, a fifth-year senior and one of the few players who predates the current coaching staff, has seen a huge difference in the quality of recruits.

"There's a lot of talent coming in. A lot of speed. And a lot of desire," he said.

"You can see they want to win. Teams I've been on before, losing was not a big deal for some people."

Northwestern's losing tradition was not a big deal to D'Wayne Bates, an exciting sophomore receiver from Aiken, S.C. He chose Northwestern even though he said his friends told him, "Northwestern hasn't won anything ever. Why are you picking a school like that?"

"Gary Barnett was very persuasive when he visited my family, very honest and very convincing," Bates said. "He told me they were going to make a change. I was looking for a school where I could be part of change, part of history. And here I am."

► MILLION MAN MARCH

Rally estimated at 400,000

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Although organizers of Monday's "Million Man March" claimed to have met and exceeded that goal, the official count by the U.S. Park Police put the number at 400,000.

Even at the smaller number, it still becomes the fourth-largest demonstration crowd on record. The largest, 600,000, was at the Vietnam War moratorium rally, Nov. 15, 1969.

The U.S. Park Police arrived at the 400,000 figure after comparing photographs made of the rally site from a helicopter every two hours beginning at 8 a.m.

"They compared the pictures on a grid and came up with the number through a mathematical formula," police Lt. Philip Kramer said. "The formula is based on Metro (subway) ridership, buses and other ways of getting to the site."

The Rev. Benjamin Chavis, co-organizer of the march, said at one point that the crowd had reached 2 million.

Kramer said the park service estimate covered the entire day and did not represent any peak time.

Other big demonstration crowds included 500,000 each at an anti-Vietnam War rally in 1971 and the National Organization for Women rally in 1992, and 300,000 at the 20th anniversary Civil Rights march in 1983.

A Solidarity Day labor march in 1981 drew 260,000 by official estimate, and the throng that was at the Lincoln Memorial for Martin Luther King's "I Have a Dream" speech numbered 250,000.

► NATION

Men line up for peaceful gathering

Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — In an unprecedented gathering amid the nation's monuments, hundreds of thousands of black men shouted promises to forswear violence and improve their lives in a revival-style chant led by Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan.

"I pledge that from this day forward, I will never raise my hand with a knife or gun to beat, cut or shoot any member of my family or any human being, except in self-defense," they chanted Monday at the climax of the day-long gathering of black men amid the nation's monuments.

Farrakhan's Million Man March called together black men for a peaceful day of praying, singing and reveling in racial unity.

The throng, estimated by the U.S. Park Police at 400,000, stretched for 12 blocks down the grassy expanse, from the foot of the Capitol to the Washington Monument. March organizers asserted the crowd numbered 2 million.

As the rally's dramatic finale, Farrakhan spoke for 2-1/2 hours, often addressing white America. White supremacy, he said, is the root of America's suffering.

"That makes you sick," Farrakhan said, "and you produce a sick society and a sick world."

Farrakhan urged the men to go home and join black organizations — even those that refused to endorse his rally — to take hold of political power, unite against racism and cleanse black communities of crime, drugs and violence.

He brushed aside critics who have condemned his inflammatory statements about Jews, Catholics, gays and Asians, and said he had divine guidance in bringing to Washington the largest assemblage of black Americans since the 1963 March on Washington.

"Whether you like it or not, God brought the idea through me, and he didn't bring it through me because my heart was dark with hatred and anti-Semitism," he said.

"If my heart was that dark, how is the message so bright?"

The day was chilly but bright, the mood serious yet buoyant.

"There is no violence here, no racism," Omar Holt of Detroit said. "It's very moving."

Young men dressed in jeans, sweat-shirts and jackets dominated the crowd. But men of all ages were jammed shoulder-to-shoulder in front of the stage. Others climbed onto statues, light posts and trees for a better view. A few waded through the Reflecting Pool, one wearing few if any clothes.

Million Man March

"It's a healing feeling to see so many black men come together, and not a whole bunch of violence or drugs or all that stuff," said Donald Simms of the Brooklyn borough of New York City. "This whole thing is about self-respect."

People lined up 10-deep around the food vendors, and the mixed aromas of barbecue and vegetarian curries filled the air. Scores of Nation of Islam members, standing erect in suits and their trademark bow ties, lent an air of solemnity.

Civil rights veterans Jesse Jackson, Rosa Parks and Dick Gregory were among dozens of back-to-back speakers who spoke from behind bullet-proof glass. Stevie Wonder sang briefly and Maya Angelou read a poem urging the crowd to do right by itself and "save your race."

Giant speakers and video screens were set up around the Mall, but most men couldn't get near enough to them to benefit.

"We can't hear," Harold Johnson of Reading, Pa., said, "but we can feel the important feel of it."

The event often had the feeling of a revival meeting, with men clapping and singing along with church choirs, then bowing their heads in prayer.

At one point, like collection plates in a church, cardboard boxes and plastic bags were passed through the crowd for contributions to defray the cost of the event and began a black economic development fund. Each time a bag was filled, organizers hoisted it into the air to the cheers of the crowd that waved dollar bills in the air.

By mid-morning, co-organizer Benjamin Chavis Jr. said the crowd had passed the 1 million mark.

The Park Police, basing their estimate on pictures taken from helicopters, did not provide their 400,000 figure until the rally concluded at dusk.

Several women spoke on stage, but few were scattered through the crowd. Farrakhan had asked them to stay home to pray, fast and teach the children. He also asked all black Americans to stay home from work or school and avoid spending money.

Phillippa Braxton of suburban Laurel, Md., came to the Mall to lend support to the men, saying, "This will show America that the black man isn't some gun-toting, drug-selling stereotype that's portrayed in the media."

At a speech in Austin, Texas, President Clinton praised the rally as an event for black men taking renewed responsibility for themselves, their families and their communities.

But he expressed disapproval of Farrakhan. Without mentioning the Nation of Islam minister by name, the president clearly criticized Farrakhan's explosive rhetoric, which has brought charges of anti-Semitism, sexism and bigotry.

"One million men do not make right one man's message of malice and division," Clinton said.

Farrakhan said Clinton did not dig deep enough to find a solution to the racial divide.

"Abraham Lincoln saw in his day what President Clinton sees in this day," Farrakhan said to the crowd. "He saw the great divide between black and white. There are still two Americas — one black, one white, separate and unequal."

Before the march, some black leaders who endorsed the event also condemned Farrakhan's incendiary words. But many on the stage and in the crowd praised his leadership.

"It's too bad we can't have Martin Luther King or Malcolm X, but we have to take what we have," Pierre Brown of Newburgh, N.Y., said.

"That's why we hold him so dear to us. He's the only one we have left who will speak out."

District of Columbia police reported no serious altercations. One elderly man died after suffering a heart attack in the midst of the rally.

Men began gathering on the Mall just after midnight, when the temperature was in the 50s.

Many brought flashlights, sleeping bags and tape decks. The first prayers and African drumming were scheduled to begin at 5 a.m., but they started more than two hours late.

The tone on stage was generally prayerful and inspirational, but an undercurrent of anger surfaced at times. Two men in the crowd wore dummies of white men on their backs.

"White dreams have crippled many black children and white values have maimed many black families because of selfishness and greed," former Illinois Rep. Gus Savage said from the stage.

In the crowd, 21-year-old Anthony Boatner of Yellow Springs, Ohio, said the rally "is a message to America that we are tired of being stepped on."

Movie raises questions about monogamy, love

Claudette Riley
staff writer

Generational patterns of love and fidelity are the living threads embroidered throughout "How to Make an American Quilt."

Jilted into a cynical projection of married life by the instability of her parents' relationship and her mother's wandering eye, Finn (Winona Ryder) questions the idea of monogamy and her ability to commit.

After becoming engaged to long-time boyfriend, carpenter Sam (Dermott Mulroney), Finn flees their Berkeley home to complete the third attempt of her master's thesis.

Finn seeks summer refuge in the warm Victorian home where her grandmother (Ellen Burstyn) and great aunt (Anne Bancroft) house their social sewing circle of friends.

As the sewing bee begins to construct a wedding quilt for Finn and Sam entitled "Where love abides," they exorcise recesses of pain hidden behind a deep love for each other and the men in their lives.

Uncovering the roots that have entangled their love, each member of the sewing society creates a symbolic patch that represents preserved moments of sweetness or the great passions of their lives.

circle confront the slamming marital choices that eroded the dreams of their lives.

Educated on the strings of infidelity and loss in the loves of her great aunts, Finn battles the seduction of a Latino temptation and tries to reconcile the broken past with her desire for a fully realized monogamous relationship.

Finn's experiences push her to expand her thesis to include the American traditions passed down through the sewing circle, and she contemplates whether she should marry a lover or a friend.

Fresh-faced and girlish, Ryder never reaches the overpowering beauty of true maturity and strength that the talented ensemble cast, including Maya Angelou, Kate Nelligan and Claire Danes, exude in a most refreshed and unforced manner.

"How to Make an American Quilt" appeals to the fears and longings women face in committed relationships. This movie forges pillars of identification between women.

However, the occasionally stark, honest but weakened portrayal of men may only serve to alienate men in the audience.

► BOARD OF REGENTS

2 sister institutions may be dropped; debate may arise

Associated Press

TOPEKA — A long-simmering debate over how best to compare Kansas' six universities to sister institutions in other states for budget purposes may come to a head Thursday when the Board of Regents meets in Hays.

Proposals and options developed by a task force that was created by the regents in mid-1994 to recommend changes in which schools are used as peer institutions will come before the board.

Primary among the options is to drop the University of North Carolina and North Carolina State as one of five peer institutions for the University of Kansas and K-State — long a sore point with legislators who control funding for the state's two showcase schools.

The task force recommended the North Carolina schools be retained as peers for KU and K-State but conceded that option carries the liability of not being readily accepted.

It suggested the regents could just use four other present peers for KU and K-State, or replace the Carolina schools with Ohio University for KU and Washington State for K-State.

The other proposal is to change a majority of the peer institutions for Wichita State University and the three regional universities at Emporia, Hays and Pittsburg.

The board meets at 9 a.m.

Thursday in Fort Hays State's Memorial Union, and the discussion of peer institutions should come before noon.

The task force put its recommendations before the board at its May meeting, but consideration was delayed until this meeting.

The Board of Regents created the task force in June 1994 after revisiting the issue of peer institutions for the first time in a dozen years.

The task force was made up of one representative from each of the six universities, with Regent Phyllis Nolan of Louisburg as the board's liaison representative.

The board took up the issue at its May 1994 meeting and was told by Rochelle Chronister, then chairwoman of the House Appropriations Committee, and Gloria Timmer, state budget director, that peer institutions were a concern of many legislators — particularly having the two North Carolina schools as peers for KU and K-State.

Gus Bogina, former chairman of the Senate Ways and Means Committee, was an outspoken critic of including the North Carolina schools as peers of KU and K-State.

He said Kansas should be under no obligation to keep up with them.

The regents began using the peer institutions two decades ago or more for budget comparisons.

► VIETNAM VETERANS

Disabled Vietnam veteran seeks to succeed senator

Associated Press

LITHONIA, Ga. — Max Cleland, a disabled Vietnam veteran who became the first chief of the Veterans Administration to have served in the war, entered the race Monday to succeed Sen. Sam Nunn.

Cleland, Georgia's secretary of state, is the first Democrat to announce his candidacy for the retiring senator's seat. Five Republicans are running.

"I hope to be an example of hope," Cleland, 53, said at the library of the small town where he was raised.

Cleland lost both legs and an arm in a grenade explosion in 1968 in Vietnam. He was awarded the Bronze Star and Silver stars.

He said his first priority if elected would be to seek a seat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, which Nunn, also a Democrat, headed before Republicans won control of the Senate in 1994.

After he left the military, Cleland served in the state Senate. In 1977, he took over the VA as one of President Carter's first appointments.

The appointment was kind of an early effort for America to acknowledge that war and to say "Thank you" to veterans, said Charles Bullock, a University of Georgia political scientist.

The military background may be of some help in earning the Armed Services Committee seat, but that probably will depend more on whether Republicans retain or increase their power after the 1996 election, Bullock said.

Cleland was first elected secretary of state in 1982 and was re-elected three times, always as one of the party's top vote-getters.

However, he was reprimanded last year by the state Ethics Commission for using office computers to maintain political contributor lists.

And in 1988, Cleland was taped by a former girlfriend in sexually explicit conversations. The tape was widely distributed by political rivals and helped dissuade Cleland, though unmarried, from running for governor in 1990.

► VIOLENCE

Teen wounded in shooting

Associated Press

OTTAWA — A cousin of one of nine juveniles arrested last month in the fatal gang shooting of an Ottawa girl was wounded in a drive-by shooting over the weekend.

Police Capt. Charles Bowling said Heath Griffin, 17, was treated for minor shotgun pellet wounds to the calves of both legs after the Sunday night shooting and released from the hospital.

A juvenile described as the driver of the van from which shots reportedly were fired was taken into custody but later released to his parents. Police said four other people believed to be in the van were being sought.

Bowling said Griffin told officers he was confronted by occupants of the van Sunday evening. "He was told to hit the ground. He took off running, and two shots were fired from the van. He was struck in the lower calf of both legs," Bowling said.

Griffin is the cousin of a youth who was arrested in connection with the Sept. 24 shooting death of Stephanie Perez, who was described as an innocent victim of a stray bullet fired in a gang retaliation fight. The cousin was adjudged a juvenile in the case.

Bowling said no connection had been made between the two shootings. "There's nothing we can come up with right now," he said.

► MILLION MAN MARCH

Clinton addresses bigotry, racism across all of America

Associated Press

AUSTIN, Texas — A thousand miles from the rally in Washington, President Clinton appealed to both whites and blacks Monday to "clean our house of racism" before it tears the nation apart.

He cited bigotry on both sides, making clear — although unspecified — references to Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan, who called for the "Million Man March," and to Mark Fuhrman, the Los Angeles police detective in the O.J. Simpson case.

"The rift that we see before us ... is tearing at the heart of America," Clinton said in a lecture at the University of Texas.

He praised the black men who crowded the national Mall in the capital. Yet, in remarks aimed at Farrakhan, Clinton said, "One million men are right to be standing up for personal responsibility."

"But one million men do not make right one man's message of malice and division."

A few hours later, Farrakhan told his massive rally that the president should "clear the scales from your eyes, Sir, and give ear to what we say."

He accused Clinton of indirectly calling him a purveyor of malice and hate, and answered, "I'm not a malicious person, I'm not filled with malice. But I must tell you I come in the tradition of the doctor who has to point out with truth, what's wrong."

He acknowledged Clinton's speech as an effort to heal the great divide. But he added, "I respectfully suggest to the president, 'You did not dig deep enough at the malady that divides black and white in order to effect a solution to the problem."

Farrakhan's inflammatory remarks in the past about Jews and about whites in general made Clinton's speech a delicate undertaking.

He called upon all Americans to do more to recognize the roots of black pain and of white fear, "to see each other as more than enemy faces, all of whom carry at last a sliver of bigotry in their hearts."

Clinton referred to participants in the Washington rally as "black men taking renewed responsibility for themselves, their families, their communities."

Addressing whites, Clinton said, "Too many destructive ideas are gaining currency in our midst. The taped voice of one policeman should fill you with outrage."

It was a reference to the explosive tapes, disclosed in the Simpson trial, in which Fuhrman used harsh racist language and spoke openly of police brutality. Clinton called on police departments to root-out internal racism, saying it was intolerable.

He did not refer to either Farrakhan or Fuhrman by name. White House press secretary Mike McCurry said there was no need to, because the references were clear — and the speech intended to address larger issues.

► SIMPSON CASE

Diary entry not used as evidence against Simpson

Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Nine days before she was slashed to death, Nicole Brown Simpson wrote in her diary that O.J. Simpson had warned her, "You hung up on me last night, you're gonna pay for this, bitch," the National Enquirer reported this week.

"You're holding money from the IRS, you're going to jail, you (expletive)," Brown quoted her ex-husband as saying one day when he came to pick up their children. "I've already talked to my lawyers about this, bitch. They'll get you for tax evasion."

The jury that acquitted Simpson of murdering his ex-wife and her friend Ronald Goldman on Oct. 3 heard that Simpson had threatened her with the Internal Revenue Service, but that was in a lawyer's letter telling her that she was no longer to use his address as her own.

The voice Brown recorded in her diary is harsher. In an entry from 1988, when she was two months pregnant with their son Justin, she wrote that he called her a fat pig, ordered her to get an abortion and drove her out of their house at gunpoint.

The jurors heard that he called his pregnant wife a fat pig but not that he demanded an abortion or aimed a gun at her.

While prosecutors publicized that diary entry and several others relating to domestic violence, and called witnesses to testify that Simpson beat his wife, neither they nor the defense sought to introduce Brown's diary as evidence.

Her diary is in possession of the court, said Sandi Gibbons, a spokeswoman for the district attorney's office.

The family has a copy, and the prosecution and defense do also. Gibbons said she did not know if the diary filed with the court and the one quoted by the tabloid were the same.

The Enquirer got the diary from someone concerned about battered women's issues, executive editor Steve Coz said Monday, refusing to say if the tabloid paid for it.

He said Brown's father, Louis Brown, authenticated the handwriting.

Simpson's lawyer, Johnnie Cochran Jr., did not immediately return a call for comment Monday.

Simpson himself spoke out in this week's Star tabloid, which includes a paid interview and photo spread with the man who calls his acquittal a miracle.

"I'm a free man at last — but now, I find myself hiding from the world, not really a free man," Simpson said. "It's like I'm still a prisoner. And I haven't really had a chance to grieve."

The Star, which previously paid for exclusive homecoming and reunion photographs, refused to say what it paid Simpson.

His emissaries had been shopping a $1 million package to the tabloids, a source told the Associated Press.

Simpson told the Star he is hiding from the media in Malibu, and he often talks to girlfriend Paula Barbieri.

"I have total confidence that things will find their own way," Simpson says. "She knows and understands that there's just no way I can think of marriage now. My children come first."

MOVIE REVIEW

'To Die For'

high on style, unoriginal plot

Russell Fortmeyer

"To Die For," the critics' latest darling of a hip movie, isn't anything to sneeze at. But this reviewer has allergies. Director Gus Van Sant's "To Die For" is pure, delicious satire of the media, television and fame. Any association to the O.J. Simpson trial is purely coincidental. The story revolves around Suzanne Stone, played to the hilt by Nicole Kidman, a ferocious Barbie doll whose only goal in life is to become the next Barbara Walters (only she can pronounce her R's). However, Suzanne is a weatherperson at a very local television station. But what a weatherperson she is — more gusto than Kathie Lee Gifford, Easter-egg-colored power-suits, and makeup that would rival Tammy Faye Messner. She's also married to a guy so dim-witted he can't help but be agreeable, played with surprising ease by Matt Dillon.

Things get sticky when Suzanne begins work on a documentary of street kids. She gets hooked up with three complete losers, who are some of the most stereotypical high-school kids the big screen has produced in recent memory.

She even has sex with the teen played by Juaquin Phoenix (River's brother). Qué scandal!

These kids are so disgusting to watch on screen (and that includes their acting ability), it would be nice if their careers begin and end with this film. If Van Sant wanted the audience to hate the kids, he succeeded brilliantly.

The real problem is that her husband wants her to quit work and hunker down to raise a family. What else can Suzanne do but conspire with the kids to bump off her husband?

Kidman has fun with Suzanne, relishing her quirky lines and outrageous behavior. She's devilish, but it's hard to believe she has much upstairs besides paper-thin desires of fame. She's not a brilliant, criminal mastermind, but a blonde goofball with homicidal tendencies.

I think this movie was made a couple of years ago with John Waters' funny, mildly forgettable "Serial Mom." Waters skewered the media and the American standard of motherhood in this film about a mother who bumps off her rivals.

The truth is Henry and Van Sant are a little late to the feed trough on this idea. What trailer-park grandma doesn't already think television and the media are out of control and that celebrities only add to society's ills? In that respect, this movie fails.

In "To Die For," Van Sant's cinematic style is quite upbeat, flashing around the story offering glimpses of each character. Though the story is old, the way it is presented is quite a bit of fun.

Phoenix's sex-crazed teen was perhaps the most realistic character in the movie, but when he was on screen, it changed the whole intent. Are we still having fun? Or are we now sad because he's such a sweet boy and now he's in prison?

I don't know, but I don't think it's to die for.

Joan Boyden, a visiting artist from Albuquerque, N.M., talks to students about art Monday afternoon in West Stadium. Boyden critiqued student work from 1 to 3 p.m.

► REVIEW

Collegian staff

Joan Boyden, a visiting artist from Albuquerque, N.M., spent most of Monday talking with students and faculty at K-State about her paintings.

Boyden's paintings comprise a new exhibit at the Willard Gallery now on display until Nov. 3.

From 3:30 to 5 p.m., Louann Culley gave a slide lecture of Boyden's work in Willard Hall. It gave Boyden a chance to reflect on her artistic journey and share her ideas with students and faculty.

Boyden's newer work, and the work showing in the exhibit, consist of architectural spaces painted in an array of colors with an emphasis in light and shape.

The human figure isn't a prominent image in Boyden's work, though it does show up sparingly. And it usually appears ambiguous with little detail and minuscule attention paid to expression. The representation of Boyden's dog is greater represented than the human figure.

"I love windows and doors and walls. They are really metaphors of states of mind that I have — feelings that I have," Boyden said.

Those windows and doors that Boyden so loves allow her to use light in very interesting and vibrant ways. Her use of light, in some instances, suggests an Edward Hopper painting: somber, lonely and directed with purpose.

It's also important to note Boyden either specifically deals with Southwestern light or East coast light.

Since most of her recent paintings are depictions of interiors, particularly her own Albuquerque home, the majority of her work is splashed with vigorous desert light.

Boyden also includes photographs in her work because, she said, between moving from Boston to Albuquerque she had many old photos she needed to toss. She uses the photos for the allusion of memories.

However, she usually ends up painting over the photos.

Boyden said there is always a heartbreaking fight of putting in the image and covering it up.

It is ironic, and sometimes frustrating, for the viewer to see an obviously cherished photo in a painting covered up.

Most of her work either includes or is based on photos she specifically took to use in her paintings for the purpose of playing around with contradictions of space.

Boyden credits the Mughal period during the 1500s in India with inspiring her use of space.

"There are a million different contradictions of what we consider perspective," she said.

Her blurry style of interior painting is borderline abstraction in what Boyden describes as paint itself becoming "just a shape of color."

Her current work, still in a very experimental stage, concerns the New Mexican sky.

Departing from her paintings are her drawings of mummies, which are included in the exhibit. "Las Momias de Guanajuato," or mummies of Guanajuato, Mexico, were something Boyden discovered on a recent trip to Mexico.

Hurricane Roxanne sinks barge, kills 3

Associated Press

CAMPECHE, Mexico — As crew members threw on lifejackets and jumped into rafts, a pipe-laying barge caught in hurricane-stirred seas sank off the Gulf coast, killing an American and two others. Planes searched Monday for 23 missing people.

The barge carrying 248 people sank about 7:45 p.m. Sunday. Two offshore supply boats and two construction tugs quickly pulled 222 people from the water but had to leave as Hurricane Roxanne approached, the Coast Guard said in a statement Monday from New Orleans.

"They had 30-foot (waves) last night in the Bay of Campeche, so that's pretty rough," Coast Guard Petty Officer Adam Wine said by telephone.

American search planes and Mexican helicopters scoured the Bay of Campeche Monday for the missing. About 30 Americans had been on the barge, but it was not immediately clear if they were among the missing.

Campeche state spokesman Sergio Romero Olivera quoted port authorities in nearby Ciudad del Carmen as identifying the dead American as Jim Vines. He was believed to be an oil worker, but no age or hometown was immediately available.

All crew members donned lifejackets with strobe lights or boarded life rafts before the vessel went down, said James Stewart, a spokesman for barge owner CCC Fabricaciones y Construcciones.

The barge was one of many maintenance ships plying the Gulf, servicing offshore platforms and oil pipelines to the mainland. Such boats often have hundreds aboard, including welders, divers and rig workers.

The Navy, in a bulletin transmitted by Mexico's state news agency, said the barge was taking oil workers back to offshore platforms after they had been evacuated late last week when Roxanne first passed by.

An American C-130 transport plane from the U.S. Coast Guard Air Station in Clearwater, Fla., and another C-130 from Kessler Air Force Base in Biloxi, Miss., took part in the search. A Coast Guard cutter refueling in Key West, Fla., was expected to arrive before dawn Wednesday.

The sinking came as Roxanne drifted just off the Mexican coast in the Bay of Campeche. The storm had sustained winds of 85 mph, and water surges flooded seafront streets in the capital of Campeche with waist-high water.

JUSTIN STAHLMAN/Collegian

Seawater levels fell 3 to 4 feet Monday. Seaweed clogged streets in some places two blocks or more from the shoreline, and some low-lying areas remained completely flooded. Workmen shoveled seaweed from the streets, and people tried to mop out drenched houses.

Roxanne, at one point downgraded to a tropical storm, is now a Category 1 hurricane — the weakest on a scale of one to five. The U.S. National Hurricane Center in Miami issued a hurricane warning along the Mexican coast from Progreso to Tampico, 250 miles from the Texas border.

At 4 p.m. Monday, Roxanne's eye was about 120 miles north-northwest of Ciudad del Carmen. The hurricane was almost stationary but was expected to move slowly southwest.

The tides rose Sunday when Roxanne, after plowing across the Yucatan Peninsula last week, looped back toward land with renewed force and battered Campeche, an area replete with shrimping and oil-drilling industries.

Roxanne killed six people during its first pass before moving into the Gulf of Mexico and meandering for days.

Main roads out of Campeche, at the base of the Yucatan Peninsula, were cut off from the rest of Mexico since Thursday. The waters from the Gulf of Mexico surged hundreds of yards inland, surrounding posh hotels along a beachfront strip. Hotel guests were evacuated overnight.

Dozens of houses were in knee-deep seawater, a soup of driftwood, coconuts and seaweed. The state's legislative palace stood in water that rose at least 4 feet up the main doorway.

Hurricane Opal flooded Campeche two weeks ago and forced thousands of people to take refuge in shelters.

Twenty-two of the 42 students going attended an informational meeting on Monday night.

"If there was a group of four or

"I think it's a great thing as far as to unite a group of people, but I think also having Farrakhan as an organizer is going to make him an official figurehead. I think he's the wrong guy because he is just as a big hypocrite as someone in the KKK," Pfister said.

Farrakhan's past record shows him to be prejudice against certain races, Pfister said.

Boyer said he was very proud students stopped to recognize the day, the March and the issues.

"I'm excited of the love, respect and unity that was poured out today, here and in Washington," Boyer said.

"Too many men think they were put on this earth to spread their seed to the four corners and then walk away from their responsibilities," he said.

MURDER TRIAL

Selena named her murderer

Associated Press

HOUSTON — As paramedics frantically tried to save the dying Tejano singer Selena, they noticed something held tightly in her clenched right fist.

"When I opened it, a ring fell out," Richard Fredrickson, a Corpus Christi paramedic, testified Friday at the trial of Yolanda Saldivar. "It was covered with blood."

Saldivar, who rose from Selena's fan club president to manager of her two boutiques, is being tried on a murder charge for shooting the singer. She faces life in prison if convicted.

The defense claims Saldivar was hysterical and shot the 23-year-old Selena by accident while waving a .38-caliber revolver.

Prosecutors contend the slaying was deliberate and took place after Selena went to a Corpus Christi motel to fire Saldivar, 35, for allegedly embezzling $30,000 from the boutiques. Selena was shot in a motel room, ran outside and collapsed in the lobby of the office.

The 14-karat gold and diamond ring, topped with a white-gold egg, was a gift from the Grammy winner's boutique employees and Saldivar.

The singer, whose full name was Selena Quintanilla Perez, was born near Easter and collected decorative eggs.

On March 31, Selena went to Saldivar's hotel room to pick up business records she needed for tax filing. A confrontation followed.

According to earlier police and media reports, Saldivar demanded back the ring. But Selena was shot before she had a chance to return it.

Fredrickson said he came upon the ring as his ambulance was rushing Selena to Memorial Medical Center in Corpus Christi. Her heart stopped and he was looking for a vein that had not collapsed so he could pump fluids back into the unconscious woman.

Hotel employees called to the stand Friday repeated the story told by earlier witnesses: Selena, bleeding profusely from a fatal bullet wound, used her dying breath to name Saldivar as her killer.

"She said 'Yolanda Saldivar in Room 158,'" Ruben Deleon, sales director at the motel, told jurors in the Houston courtroom. The trial was moved because of publicity and the singer's popularity in her hometown of Corpus Christi.

"She was yelling, 'Help me, help me. I've been shot,'" Rosalinda Gonzalez, an assistant manager at the motel, said. "I asked who shot her. She said the lady in Room 158. She moaned. Her eyes rolled up."

Front desk clerk Shawna Vela said she dialed 911 and took the phone with her as she knelt over the fallen singer, asking her what happened.

"She said 'Yolanda, in room 158,'" Vela testified.

The gripping, sometimes gruesome testimony pushed Selena's family to tears as Saldivar stoically stared at the witness stand. Selena's brother, A.B. Quintanilla, cried with his head in his hands. His wife, Vangie, wiped away tears and rubbed her husband's back.

On Thursday, three other motel employees said they saw Selena running and screaming down a corridor as Saldivar pursued her with the gun. After the shooting, they said Saldivar went calmly back to the room, then got in her truck.

She drove to the back of the hotel, where she was blocked by police cars. Corpus Christi policeman Bernardo Torres testified Friday he approached the truck and Saldivar denied she had shot anyone.

When he saw she had a gun, he drew his own, he said.

"I got on the radio that she has a gun to her head," Torres said. "At that point she said 'I want to kill myself.'"

Saldivar surrendered 9 1/2 hours later.

Carnival activities block fire lanes

The Life-o-Matic Carnival, an advertising event, blocked fire lanes and restricted pedestrian flow through the area between the K-State Student Union and Seaton Hall.

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

Fire lanes between the K-State Student Union and Seaton Hall were blocked Monday and Tuesday by the Life-o-Matic carnival.

All groups that reserve the area between the Union and Seaton Hall must leave one lane open for emergency vehicles, such as fire trucks, said Lolita Sump, manager of support services for physical facilities.

Student groups can reserve the area for events. To reserve the area, a group must fill out a building and grounds request form. The group's faculty adviser must sign the form, Sump said.

The carnival was sponsored by Union Program Council, but no one from UPC had any comment on the blocked fire lane.

No one from facilities polices events to make sure groups have complied with the one-lane-open requirement. Facilities investigates only when a complaint is lodged with it during the event.

However, Capt. Charles Beckom with K-State Police said he does check out all events set up in that area. All tents must be easily dismantled and staffed at all times. Keys to any vehicles used as part of the event must also be on site and within reach of the vehicle at all times.

Beckom checks the events himself and is often on hand when a group sets up. He said he also approves the set up and the police provide staff for tents in the evening hours.

A passageway about 18 feet wide was open in one of the lanes, Beckom said. No one from facilities checked to make sure the lane was open, and it received no complaints about the area being congested.

Beckom said he checked to make sure the passageway was wide enough to fit a fire truck through with the end of the tent that projected into the street unassembled.

Sump said she hadn't gone over and observed, but she hadn't received any calls.

Facilities and the campus police have a meeting to discuss each event before it takes place, she said.

"One of the concerns is that what is set up is collapsible versus something like a big trailer that would take some time to move," she said.

Sump said that as long as the set up for the event is easy to dismantle, it should not be a problem for emergency equipment.

The carnival also restricted pedestrian flow through the plaza.

Bicyclists and pedestrians had to share a smaller walkway in front of the Union to make way for the Life-o-Matic tour.

Russell Fortmeyer, Student Senate Parking and Campus Safety Committee chairman, said he was upset because one of the busiest walkways on campus was blocked by a carnival.

"More planning and thought needs to go into these events," Fortmeyer said.

He said he had spoken with bicyclists in the area during the noon rush, and they told him they were not happy about the congestion in the area.

"We can't just let any corporation come in and use the main pedestrian plaza on campus as an advertising venue," he said.

INVESTIGATION COMPLETE

The investigation into the Aug. 20 assault involving members of the K-State football team has been concluded, Riley County Police Investigations Captain Steven French said.

"After our initial investigation was sent up, there were still some holes we needed to fill," French said. "Those holes have now been filled, and we have sent the complete report to the county attorney's office."

ARSON SUSPECTED IN FIRE

The Manhattan Fire Department is still investigating the fire that occurred Sunday night at 1026 Yuma St. Arson is suspected because there were two separate points of origin for the fire and the house was unoccupied at the time.

"The investigation is ongoing until we find the right person," Fire Marshall Donald Francis said.

The fire department is working with the house owners and the Riley County Police Department to develop leads, Francis said. There are no suspects.

GREEKS REMEMBER ALCOHOL-RELATED DEATHS WITH A WEEK OF AWARENESS

Holly McConkey
staff reporter

The sidewalks surrounding fraternity and sorority houses will be glowing tonight in remembrance of those who have lost their lives in drinking-related accidents.

Greeks Advocating the Mature Management of Alcohol, will help promote National Collegiate Alcohol Awareness Week by having all the greek houses light candles from 8:30 to 9:30 tonight.

"What we are doing is giving each house 36 paper bags filled with sand. They are responsible for having someone set them up," Lauren Jones, chairperson for NCAA week, said. "They also must provide their own candles."

The illuminating bags, which will line driveways and sidewalks, represent the 36 college-age students who died in Kansas last year in alcohol-related accidents, Gibran Diab, sophomore in business management, said.

Students from Fort Hays State University will also join in the activities of NCAA week here at K-State by putting on a series of skits at 12:30 p.m. Thursday in the Union Courtyard.

The group, Tiger by the Tale, will do a performance that deals with controversial subjects, such as AIDS, drugs and drinking and driving, Diab said.

The goal of this week's activities is not to condone the use of alcohol, but to make sure that when people drink, they do it responsibly, Jelena Jovanovic, assistant director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Services, said.

"We're not there to make a judgment about it. We just want you to be safe," she said. Blue ribbons will also be worn this week to honor the 36 students that died last year, Jones said. Jovanovic said she hopes people will be curious about what the blue ribbons stand for and ask questions about them.

GAMMA is a new organization that was started this year on campus. It stemmed from another organization on campus called BACCHUS, Boost Alcohol Consciousness Concerning the Health of University Students, Jovanovic said.

Both GAMMA and BACCHUS are national organizations that share the same headquarters and the same goals. GAMMA works with greek students, and BACCHUS is focused on non-greek students, she said.

"We had SADD, but people thought it was too high-schoolish. We revamped it to BACCHUS, and GAMMA grew out of it," she said. "Both of the organizations are designed to be educational and social in nature."

Jovanovic said their goal is to have a member of GAMMA represented in each greek chapter and a member of BACCHUS in each resident hall.

Because GAMMA is a new organization, it didn't have much time to plan for this week's activities.

"We only had a couple of weeks to prepare. But we've had a really good turnout. It's hard to get everyone involved," Jones said. "But it's good to get a good feeling for the first year so you have something to go on for next time."

CITY COMMISSION

Mall asks to re-finance bonds

Nikola Zytow
staff writer

Forest City, a company that manages the Manhattan Town Center, proposed at Tuesday night's city commission meeting that the outstanding Manhattan Mall Industrial Revenue Bonds be purchased from the current bondholder and remarketed.

Lennar Northeast Partnership holds $19 million in mall bonds. Forest City is looking to market them to FirstBank, BC Christopher Co. and Crews and Associates.

The commission decided the information regarding the marketing strategy needed to be reviewed by city staff. The commission will meet at 6 p.m. Oct. 24 at the Manhattan fire station headquarters to decide on the matter.

In other business, the commission decided to ask for authorization from the state to extend the application process for the Manhattan Disaster Relief Program for six months.

Karen Davis, director of community development, said the city has about $210,000 available from its $585,000 grant that could be used to help local property owners who were affected by the flood of 1993.

Davis said about a dozen people had contacted her office, saying they had missed the deadline but could use the money.

Davis said she was concerned about the administrative time and money that would be necessary to extend the deadline. She said the city's grant coordinator had left for another job and her office was understaffed.

In a memo distributed to commissioners, Davis also said the passage of time has made flood claims harder to document.

She said that because the local government is now involved in a flood buyout program, the county might end up buying property that has already been improved.

Commissioner Bruce Snead said he supported an extension of the deadline despite the administrative costs.

"I don't want to allow an opportunity to pass for people who suffered," he said, "but it is going to cost us."

The commission also authorized the city manager to provide a $20,000 payment to the Board of Commissioners of Riley County to assist in the development of a Geographic Information System.

The system is a digital map of the area that is designed to help local governments with emergency dispatching and city planning.

► STRAY MISSILE CRASHES INTO SHED, FORCES EVACUATION OF HOMES

LEVEL PLAINS, Ala. (AP) — A small military missile crashed into a shed behind a home early Tuesday, forcing the evacuation of nearby homes, authorities said. No injuries were reported.

Level Plains Police Lt. Ralph Reed described the missile as a live, 18-inch-long Air Force weapon.

However, Level Plains Mayor Billy Waters said, "I wouldn't say we've got a live missile. We've got it sealed off until we see what we've got."

Reed said a one-block area was evacuated while bomb specialists from Fort Benning, Ga., were sent to the site about 80 miles southeast of Montgomery.

The family who lives in the house heard a loud crash about 6 a.m., Reed said, and when they went to investigate, they found the missile lodged in the roof of their storage shed.

Reed said it was not immediately known where the missile was launched. The site is about 100 miles southwest of Fort Benning and about 75 miles northeast of Eglin Air Force Base in Florida.

Eglin spokeswoman Lois Walsh said base officials didn't have any reason to think the missile came from there.

"We've got feelers out all over trying to find answers to see if Eglin is involved at all, but haven't confirmed anything," she said.

► ARKANSAS TEEN-AGER SUSPECTED IN MURDERS OF PARENTS, SISTER

RECTOR, Ark. (AP) — Dental records were used to identify the family found in the same house where a teen-age boy threw parties amid the stench, and autopsies showed his family died from gunshot wounds.

Aaron Flick Hodge, 17, was being held without bond on three counts of murder in the deaths of his parents and sister.

The bodies were so badly decomposed that state medical examiners used dental records to identify them, state police spokesperson Wayne Jordan said Monday.

The bodies of David Flick, 36, his wife, Barbara, 34, and their daughter, Andria, 11, were found Saturday in their home in Rector, a town of about 2,300 near the Missouri border. Hodge is Flick's stepson.

Authorities said the teen-ager threw parties and drove around in Flick's pickup truck for a week as the bodies rotted in the house.

► MAN INDICTED FOR ONLINE PORN

WICHITA (AP) — A Wichita man has been indicted on 11 counts of computer pornography, U.S. Attorney Randy Rathbun announced.

Bryon Hoyle, 30, was indicted for sending and receiving sexually explicit pictures of young boys through America-Online between Aug. 19 and Sept. 10.

If convicted, Hoyle faces a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison without parole and a $250,000 fine on each of the 11 counts, Rathbun said Tuesday.

America-Online is a computer network that provides subscribers with access to the Internet. It also provides subscribers with an electronic-mail system.

Rathbun said a computer is an ideal repository for pornography because it can store images or pictures in digital form.

"Parents need to know that their children could be exposed to graphic, sexually explicit material when using online services," Rathbun said.

"Allowing your children free and unsupervised access to these services is like dropping them off in the middle of New York City."

► NASA SETS 7TH LAUNCH ATTEMPT

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. (AP) — NASA will try Friday for the seventh time to launch space shuttle Columbia on a laboratory research mission.

The flight was delayed a record-tying sixth time on Sunday because of bad weather. It's now three weeks late.

Columbia also set the six-scrub record in 1986.

NASA could have tried to launch Columbia on Thursday, but that plan was scrapped when an unmanned Atlas rocket failed to blast off Tuesday because of high wind. The Atlas launch slipped to today, and Columbia consequently was moved to Friday morning.

The Air Force tracks all launches from Cape Canaveral for safety purposes and needs one to two days after one flight to get ready for the next one.

Atlas rocket maker Lockheed Martin Corp. long ago had reserved launch dates for early this week, and NASA has to wait its turn.

If the Atlas isn't off the ground by Wednesday, NASA will assume priority. And if Columbia isn't aloft by early next week, Atlantis will be the next shuttle to fly.

Credit Unions are there to help you with the smaller financial needs as well as the big ones, from homes appliances to new cars. # Virtual fun

■ Game disorients, encourages play fights

Darin Siefkes and Phil Roberts
Collegian

Students donned odd-looking helmets with video-screen goggles and stereo speakers Tuesday on the lower floor of the K-State Student Union for the ultimate in modern video-game technology.

Participants stood on a circular platform, waving plastic gun-like devices in front of them while contorting their bodies in odd, jerking motions.

One would hope the end justified the means.

"Basically, the person is disoriented," Steve Vanderbaan, employee of Kramer Entertainment Agency, said. "We use the external monitor to see where they're at and teach them about the new environment. It's pretty cool if you want to get with a friend and fight each other."

The free virtual reality demonstration was brought to campus by Union Program Council.

Virtual reality is nothing new. St. Louis has had a virtual arcade for more than three years, and the U.S. military began using virtual reality for pilot training long before Nintendo was invented.

Virtual reality is finally taking off as a true commercial venture because of the decreasing cost of the machines and improvements in technology, Vanderbaan said.

Virtual reality is a computer-based technology that allows people to interact directly with audio-visual computer programs. In the simplest systems, individuals wear helmets that contain a series of magnetic tracking devices.

The most complex systems feature full-bodied, sensor-filled suits.

The tracking devices track the body of players and bring their images up on an external monitor and in the video goggles, integrating it with a pre-written graphics program.

Each machine is microphoned, allowing each player to talk to the other through the headset. A pounding soundtrack and electronic voice simulations added excitement to the visual effects.

This requires a huge amount of computing power. As computers advance, so does the realism of virtual reality. One day, it may reach the point depicted in Stephen King's book and movie "The Lawnmower Man." But for now, students will likely only see the helmet models.

The demo that came to the Union last year had a problematic one-second lag between the player's head movements and the corresponding perspective change on the video screens. This lag time can cause a number of ailments, especially motion sickness.

This year's machines had a slight lag when multiple targets were on the screen, but the lag was manageable. For people having a lot of trouble adjusting, one of the game supervisors was there to help talk users through the five-minute game and even occasionally to help point the gun.

Various games, including H-E-R-O, Grid Busters, Virtual Boxing, Dactyl Nightmare and Zone Hunter were available for play.

The true innovation with this particular virtual reality system was the 360-degree rotation that puts games like the popular Doom to shame. Virtual reality added the ability to look up and down as far as Students wait in line to experience the realm of virtual reality in the Union Courtyard Tuesday afternoon. Union Program Council spent $2,000 to bring Kramer Entertainment Agency employees and machines to the Union for the day.

■ Public education goal of new Web site

Karrin Thomas
staff reporter

The Extension Systems and Agricultural Research Program's World Wide Web site makes getting information out to Kansans a much faster process.

The ESARP site, which is still under construction, is managed and maintained by the Core Electronic Publishing Team of the Department of Communications in the Division of Cooperative Extension.

Extension's mission is to educate the public in areas of agriculture, family and community development.

One of the ways it does this is through the distribution of numerous printed materials through county Extension offices and the distribution center at K-State.

About 2,000 publications are available with about 250 of those now available on the program's page.

However, with the Web site, this information can go to users much faster.

"I see the opportunities already where people can have access to new bulletins several weeks before they would be available through the normal printing and distribution channels," Chuck Otte, Geary County Extension agent, said.

Some new publications are being planned as electronic publications only, said George Brandsberg, electronic publishing specialist in the Department of Communications.

This has the potential to save money on printing and reformatting costs, although Brandsberg said he doesn't expect electronic publications to replace printed ones.

Every county Extension office should be on-line within the next six weeks, Brandsberg said.

Having the counties on-line will make it easier for people to get information of local concern.

"What I see happening is the Extension Service, including the county Extension offices, becoming much more a provider of WWW-accessible information than a user of that information," Otte said.

"We plan to have a WWW home page for the Geary County

Internet access

Internet-related stories appear in each Wednesday issue of the Collegian.

The site includes the Weather Link Library, a source for local forecasts with links to other weather information, links to departmental sites and publications on topics, such as agriculture, food fact sheets and home economics.

NCAA Week needs to address wider audience

Responsible behavior should also be accentuated with discussions of the root problems of over-indulgence.

Many students on the K-State campus would agree that a large part of traditional college life is partying, drinking and having a good time with friends.

However, too many times, the idea of having a good time backfires on those who overindulge in alcohol.

This week, the K-State chapters of Greeks Advocating the Mature Management of Alcohol and Boost Alcohol Consciousness Concerning the Health of University Students are sponsoring National Collegiate Alcohol Awareness Week.

The activities are designed to increase awareness of alcohol-related issues and address the necessity of responsible drinking.

These concepts and concerns are certainly valid enough to devote more than a single week.

The messages of NCAA Week need to be addressed, but it would be great if programs like these could be presented to the K-State campus periodically throughout the year.

Those concerns are also all-inclusive.

Residence halls and other campus organizations should take opportunities like this to inform students that partying responsibly is not just a good idea, but an idea that is vital whenever and wherever there are social functions involving alcohol.

Responsible behavior should also be accentuated with discussions of the root problems of overindulgence.

Stress, social climate, peer pressure and personal problems all contribute to the exaggeration of the party mentality.

From these exaggerations stem the problems that NCAA Week will be addressing.

The thoughtful effort of NCAA Week should be expanded upon so all students could benefit.

Treating servers with respect yields better restaurant service

"Not only were they drunk and covered the entire table with syrup, but then they only left me 26 cents," my friend Meg said, relating one of her nights waiting tables at a certain all-night eatery here in town. (If that happened to be you, I suggest you go back and apologize; she's still mad, and that was three weeks ago.)

I am also a waitress. That is, when I'm not leading my other life of mild-mannered college student and intrepid columnist.

Actually, I think food server is supposed to be more politically correct, more '90s, less reminiscent of truck stops and the old TV show "Alice."

I've been a waitress/server for a long time, close to three years, and I have quite a few friends who are also in this line of work.

It's not a bad way to make a living. There are worse things to do — filling potholes comes to mind. I have plenty of good work-related stories I will reel off with little or no provocation.

KADY GUYTON

Psychology majors usually have a good time working in restaurants, and so do sociology majors. The study material is varied and constant.

After having a job like this long enough, your outlook starts to change. It becomes harder to really relax, go out and enjoy a meal because you know what the waiters are doing back in the kitchen.

After talking to a few of my friends and interrogating various waiters around town, I've uncovered a few basic truths.

■ Customers who have been servers are always nice when things go wrong, customers who have not been try to bite your head off.

The important thing for the average customer to remember is that once I take the order, how your food turns out is out of my hands. I don't cook, and believe me, if I could, I would.

■ When it's really busy, service tends to suffer. It's no one's fault, really — it just happens sometimes. As Meg puts it, "When I'm the only person working during bar rush on a game night, I'm not ignoring them on purpose." Well said.

■ When in doubt, tip. I don't care to think about how much money I used to lose because people thought the tip was added in.

Look at the check. To tell if the gratuity is added, there will either be a figure marked tip or the sales tax will be huge. Sometimes it's printed on the menu. If none of these are here, leave something. A little-known fact — most waiters only get $2.12 an hour and are supposed to make up the rest out of tips.

Thank your server with a little extra gratuity. If you're not good at mental math, ask the waiter to add it on. Waiters tend to be an honest bunch, and they like to know you care. Fifteen percent is the government-recommended minimum, but 20 to 25 percent promises good service next time.

■ We have bad days, too. There's nothing quite like having the worst day of your existence than having to go to work and be nice to people. The tricky part is trying to pass it off as sincerity. There's a reason so many actors are waiters.

■ Don't go out to eat if you're drunk and can't remember how much money you have. If you can't remember, then you probably don't have any and should be in bed. All you'll do in a restaurant is tempt your waitress to dump something in your lap. So, unless your friends are sober enough to count for you, spare everyone the grief.

Waiting tables is not a hard job, but it's not that easy either. There's a lot of backstage work that goes on to make your dinner a pleasant experience.

I think most places pull it off quite well.

Personally, I've thought that two years mandatory service as a waiter or some other customer-related job would make this country a much better place.

► RESPONSIBLE DRINKING

Editor,

The K-State chapters on GAMMA (Greeks Advocating the Mature Management of Alcohol) and BACCHUS (Boost Alcohol Consciousness Concerning the Health of University Students) will be sponsoring National Collegiate Alcohol Awareness Week activities on the K-State campus Oct. 16-22.

The week is designed to increase student awareness regarding alcohol issues and to promote the responsible use of alcohol for those who choose to drink.

Throughout the week, K-State students will be wearing blue ribbons to show their support for the goals of the week.

An unique activity during the week will be the lighting of "luminaries" between 8:30 and 9:30 tonight.

Thirty-six luminaries will be on display at local sororities and fraternities to represent the deaths of 36 college-aged persons in drinking and driving accidents in Kansas in 1994.

On Thursday, starting at 12:30 p.m. in the Union Courtyard, a peer theater group of students from Fort Hays State University called Tiger by the Tale will be giving a performance.

Tiger by the Tale is a laid-back look at some of today's controversial topics such as AIDS, sex, alcohol and drugs, sexually transmitted diseases, etc.

We encourage students to participate in the week of activities and continue responsible use of alcohol throughout the year.

► MARCH/FARRAKHAN

Editor,

I was profoundly dismayed by the Collegian's praise for the Million Man March.

No matter what motivated those who descended on our nation's capital, I cannot ignore that they were summoned by the call of someone who should be an anachronism in the last decade of a century that has learned the terrible lessons of the Holocaust and racial apartheid.

Some say we should separate the message of the march from Louis Farrakhan, its organizer and keynote speaker.

I cannot.

Farrakhan calls my religion, Judaism, "a gutter religion," and members of my faith "blood suckers." He attacks others with his virulent invective as well — Asian Americans, Hispanic Americans, Catholics and gays.

Whether he speaks from a pulpit, a university lectern or the Capitol steps, his racist vitriol poisons whatever else others find noble or compelling in his message.

Those who came to listen to him or share the podium with him were discredited by Farrakhan's presence, just as the racial epithets spoken by Mark Fuhrman tainted the prosecution's case against O.J. Simpson.

However they appear, in whatever guise — in police badges or bow ties — bigots should be repudiated and ostracized.

It is the duty of thoughtful people to do so loudly and clearly.

► REC CHILD CARE

Editor,

Last Friday's Collegian read, "There is an equal opportunity for each student to use the Rec, except for those who are parents of children." I agree with everything preceding the comma.

Can someone please tell me just exactly why parents of children can't use the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex?

Is there a sign outside saying that parents aren't allowed? Or would I be more correct in saying that people are just once again whining about what the Big 8's No. 1 recreational facility doesn't have?

This is definitely not front-page material unless the Collegian is trying to help five social work students get an A in some class.

Having a child requires certain responsibility. That means you don't always get a chance to go out on a Saturday night, go to a sporting event or go to the Rec on a regular basis. Live with it, or don't have children.

Secondly, the article said 446 signatures were on the petition. Obviously, we should have child care in the Rec if one out of 40 people on campus wants it.

What was I thinking? I believe that the Rec Complex Services Council was 100-percent right in its decision not to adopt the proposal.

Having free proctology exams in the Rec would be more worthwhile (to quote a former roommate of mine, Jason Rucker) than this.

Campus issues demand student attention

Usually, a column like this one doesn't appear until it's time for the student body to elect its representatives for Student Senate and Union Program Council.

Within the column, there is always the general pleading about lack of voter interest and the heartfelt plea from the columnist to get involved if one is unhappy with the way things are going.

The only time I used to vote was when I had a friend running; however, as one of the many individuals on this campus who seldom votes, I always used to read those columns with a smirk on my face.

Simply put, before this semester, I didn't think Senate had any say whatsoever as to what happened on this campus.

I overlooked many of its decisions, marking them as unimportant. I doubt many people on this campus can name one thing before this semester that Senate had an effect on. If something was important enough to be remembered, then it would be.

This semester has opened my eyes to the effect our young politicians have on this campus and in our lives.

In order to combat rising tuition and fees, they are attempting to cut our spending costs by modifying student fees.

For instance, instead of paying a flat rate at fee payment, individuals at Lafene Health Center would pay every time they use services provided there. I question this change because few people realize this is the cheapest form of medical insurance they will ever have access to.

Additionally, anyone who reads the Collegian or keeps up with campus issues is aware of the recent debate concerning the UPC's substantial loss over the now-infamous Soul Asylum concert, as well as the statements regarding the performance of officers within UPC.

JUSTIN WILD

About a year and a half ago, when Student and Faculty senates were discussing a plus/minus system of grading, there was some discussion over the issue because academics is an area that affects everyone within the University.

Equal attention should be given to the recent developments surrounding UPC and Student Senate, because the propositions at hand involve the amount of money every student spends on this campus.

Involvement in the affairs of government and UPC does not and should not mean actually getting involved and running for office.

Rather, involvement means not only voting but being well educated about the candidates running for office. The act of voting itself is no good when the person voting knows little about the candidates or issues in question.

During the elections this spring, don't make decisions regarding candidates just because they might give rides back to your house or give you a popsicle. Make decisions based on what they say, as well as how they react to questions surrounding their integrity.

Some of the current officials might be running for office again, and voting for them could also mean voting for the same mistakes.

When there is no questioning, when there are no protests, then business continues as usual. It was a good thing that the Collegian brought the UPC's loss of money to light because it, of course, would not have.

The agenda of Student Senate is published every week for a reason — to inform the public of what is going on.

We should all be watchdogs when the issue at hand directly concerns us.

At K-State, the matters now being considered affect every student who lines up at Ahearn Field House in the sweltering heat of August and the bitter cold of January to pay fees.

Don't treat issues with ambivalence; if you end up disliking the changes at hand, then blame yourself. It isn't the politicians, but those who elect them and do not watch them, who are to blame.

Health risk

Lack of physical inactivity has been linked to many health problems including colorectal cancer, osteoporosis, heart disease and strokes.

If you aren't exercising, you're risking your health

Ashley Cellar
staff writer

Physical exercise and activity have become increasingly significant aspects in people's lives because of the positive effects exercise has been proven to have on overall health.

Several research studies have been conducted on the benefits of exercise. These studies illustrate that physical activity improves not only physical and mental health, but can also prevent someone from having heart problems and other conditions that arise from lack of exercise, according to the Kansas Department of Health and Environment.

At K-State, there does not seem to be a problem among the students with lack of exercise.

On an average day, about 2,000 students use the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, said Steve Martini, associate director of recreational services at the Rec Complex.

Amy Gates, senior in elementary education, said she tries to work out whenever she can.

"It's hard to be rigid about it because school takes precedence over exercising. But I know people who are very strict about making sure they go to the Rec every day," Gates said. "For the most part, I think most students try to fit some form of exercise into their schedules."

Martini said the number of students using the Rec Area has increased 30-40 percent since last year.

He also said he believes the students at K-State are active and make use of the facilities at the Rec Complex, whether they come to play basketball, take aerobics classes or lift weights.

When students voted to expand the Rec Complex in 1991, Martini said, they were confident they would get a lot of use out of the additional facilities and the number of students that go through the Rec every day is a good indication that they do.

Michael Skahan, graduate student in speech, said he participates in sports to keep himself busy.

"Intramurals and club sports keep me from sitting on the couch all day, and it seems to me that most of the students here are involved in some type of exercise or sport," Skahan said.

But this does not mean everyone is exercising.

According to a study conducted in 1993 by the Kansas Department of Health and Environment, most Kansans are not exercising enough.

This puts them at risk for developing health problems, such as coronary heart disease, fluctuating blood pressure and changes in glucose tolerance.

This study showed that 75 percent of Kansans are physically inactive, 23 percent are active and 2 percent are unknown. Of all age groups researched, the group with the lowest percentage of physical inactivity was 18- to 24-year-olds (69 percent).

Arwen Bolinder, freshman in childhood education, works part-time at the Rec Complex. "I think coming to the Rec has become a sort of social event because students see people they know when they come here. Most of the students come in groups with their friends, which makes it more fun to exercise and easier to be consistent with their workouts," she said.

Setting up your own exercise program

Sara Edwards
staff writer

Although there are fitness centers and aerobics classes, some people stay at home to exercise.

Cost and convenience are reasons some people start an exercise program at home.

People need to be in good health before they start an exercise program, said Paul Krebs, assistant professor of kinesiology. Then, a person should start off with moderate exercise.

"People should find something they enjoy and stay with it," Krebs said. Sarah Forsyth, assistant director of fitness and aquatics for recreational services, said people need to include three different areas in their exercise program. These programs are cardiovascular or aerobic, strength and endurance, and flexibility.

Stretching is something that can be done as many times as the person wants, said Michelle Bishop, exercise leader and fitness consultant for recreational services and senior in nutrition and exercise science. They should be sure to stretch before and after their workout.

Cardiovascular exercise includes running, swimming, biking or any other aerobic activity. To get the most beneficial workout, people should work out three to five times a week for 20 minutes to one hour in their target heart rate zone, Bishop said.

Many people use workout videos.

Bishop and Laura Schaaff, exercise leader and fitness consultant for recreational services and senior in nutrition and exercise science, said the videos are good if they're not boring. The people in the videos should have credentials in the field. Bishop and Schaaff recommended Tamilee Webb, Jane Fonda, Kathy Smith and Karen Voight.

Fitness equipment like treadmills, stair climbers, ski machines and stationary bicycles can also provide a good workout at home.

It would be hard to get in shape using just one piece of equipment because it doesn't always provide someone with a cardiovascular workout as well as strength training, Bishop said.

Personal trainers are another resource for at-home exercisers. They provide one-on-one instruction and motivation to the individual. Personal trainers in this area can range between $30 and $50 an hour, Bishop said. "If they're qualified, they can be very helpful," Krebs said.

A workout routine should also include resistance training with weights. Every muscle group should be worked on, but people should allow 48 hours to pass each time they exercise the same muscle group, Bishop said.

People can use weight benches, free weights and bands for strength training at home.

The Wellness Resource Center at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex provides fitness consulting.

It is important to know how to use exercise equipment and weight equipment. The fitness consultants at the Rec can show someone how to properly use a piece of equipment they have at home, Bishop and Schaaff said.

PHILLIPS INELIGIBLE FOR K-STATE VS. NEBRASKA

LINCOLN, Neb. (AP) — Suspended running back Lawrence Phillips could return to practice with Nebraska as early as this week, Coach Tom Osborne said Tuesday. But Phillips won't play for the next two weeks for the second-ranked Huskers, Osborne said. He will miss games Saturday against No. 8 K-State and Oct. 28 at No. 9 Colorado. Osborne said Phillips' return to practice depends on a decision by school officials about whether Phillips will face university disciplinary action for assaulting his former girlfriend.

Senior Elliot Hatcher leads returners

'He's exhibited a lot of leadership' — Tom Asbury

Shana Newell
staff writer

When the K-State men's basketball takes the court in Bramlage Coliseum Nov. 11, it will be returning six lettermen.

Each player has the potential to help the Wildcats finish higher in the Big 8 this season than in 1994, Coach Tom Asbury said.

Of the six returning lettermen, senior guard Elliot Hatcher is expected to explode this season after emerging in 1994 as one of the premier point guards in the country. In five of the eight statistical categories recognized by the Big 8 conference, Hatcher finished in the Top 10.

Only Oklahoma's Ryan Minor finished in more categories with seven.

Asbury said he expects a good year from Hatcher, even though he is recovering from recent knee surgery. "It has been pretty much a priority for him to finish his college career with a strong finish," Asbury said.

"If off of what I've seen so far is any indication, he's exhibited a lot of leadership, and I think that his game — even though he's a little bit rusty now from the inactivity from the surgery — he'll come back."

Senior forward and team captain Tyrone Davis looks to improve his statistics after being returned to his natural position at power forward. Last season Davis spent much time at center.

"He had a great year for us under the conditions of being closely guarded, single, double- and triple-teamed on numerous occasions. He's much improved," Asbury said.

"Physically, he's in much better shape than he was a year ago. He's worked much harder on his perimeter game. He's the captain and a key and very much a leader," he said.

Also returning to the team will be senior center George Hill, senior guard Brian Gavin, and sophomore guards Aaron Swartzendruber and Mark Young.

Asbury said he is looking to utilize Hill's active defense and strength in the center slot.

"He is a very strong, very active post defender, probably one of the best post defenders in the conference," he said.

"He is certainly a guy that is going to play for us, and I hope he will continue to improve offensively," Asbury said.

Transfer players add depth to Cats' roster

'I'm just looking to come in and contribute' — Gerald Eaker

Dan Lewerenz
sports editor

Last year, K-State men's basketball coach Tom Asbury said he needed big men and shooters.

It looks as though he's met his goal.

Eight new players join the Wildcat roster this season.

Of those eight, four are 6 feet, 8 inches or taller.

The biggest of the big men is 6' 11" Gerald Eaker, a prep standout who transferred from Southeastern Community College in Iowa.

"I like to play defense, and I like to block shots," Eaker said.

"I'm not looking to come in and change the game — I'm just looking to come in and contribute," Eaker said.

Johnnie Williams, a 6' 9" transfer from Cloud County Community College, will also add depth to the front line.

"My game is based on power," Williams said.

"I like to fight it out down low. I think the Big 8 being a physical conference will help my game," he said.

Manny Dies, a 6' 8" freshman from Wichita South High School, figures to be the third power player to join the K-State roster.

"In high school, I mainly tried to overpower players. But here I want to expand my game and be a little more versatile," Dies said.

"I've been working on my ball-handling so that I can move outside more. Hopefully, I'll play a little different than in high school," he said.

The final front-line addition is 6' 10" freshman Shawn Rhodes from Wichita Northwest High School.

"I want to play wherever they need me," Rhodes said.

"I hope I can help the outside shooting woes K-State had last year," he said.

Anton Hubert, a 6' transfer from Central College in McPherson, shot 45 percent from the arc last year and figures to be the shooter Asbury calls on first.

"Coach was looking for a shooter, and I hope I can fill that role," Hubert said.

Brian Lolar and Chris Marsh also look to get some time at the 2-guard spot.

The final addition to the Wildcat roster is 6' 2" point guard Chris Griffin, a transfer from Washington State who must sit out this season because of NCAA transfer rules.

"The whole team, we're out to play," Williams said.

"And I think we can go somewhere this year."

Marsh said he agreed.

"We've got a lot of leadership returning, and there's a lot of talent on this team," Marsh said.

"I think we can surprise a lot of people," he said.

Fans anticipating basketball season

'expectations for the team are high' — a K-State basketball fan

Chris May
staff reporter

The K-State men's basketball team showed more than its basketball talent Saturday night at the Midnight Cat Attack.

The six returning players for the Wildcats showed they can get down and funky.

"The coolest part was when the players got out on the floor and danced and lip-synched," said Becca Stith, sophomore in secondary education and English.

Power forward Tyrone Davis began the lip-synching, followed by sophomore guard Aaron Swartzendruber's rendition of "Play That Funky Music White Boy."

But the focus of the night was the team and the upcoming season.

Stith and Jill Ryan, sophomore in elementary education, camped out for basketball tickets and got 13 row seats in the ICAT section, Stith said.

"We're ready for the season to start," Ryan said.

Not all the fans at the Midnight Cat Attack were K-State students.

There were families as well as alumni in the stands catching a glimpse of the 1995-96 men's team.

"I thought they looked good," Nolan McDonald, a 12-year-old from Salina, said.

"At one time, I was confused if it was a dunking contest or a scrimmage. But it was fun," McDonald said.

McDonald came to the Cat Attack with his older sister, Kristin, a sophomore in pre-occupational therapy.

They came early enough to get T-shirts and see all of the events.

"In general, I thought they looked OK. This type of format is for the fans. It's just a show-off," Marc Riegel, senior in music education, said.

Better recruiting means that the Cats are starting to build a program, but that's something that will not happen overnight, Riegel said.

"Thumbs up to Coach Asbury for getting good recruits," Riegel said.

Riegel said he feels Asbury has made the right steps and that the fans need to start showing up for the games and supporting Asbury through this process.

Recruiting seemed to be on the minds of most students.

"The expectations for the team are high this year, with Asbury recruiting a lot," Jon Bacon, junior in elementary education, said.

"You can't compete in the Big 8 without a big man inside," Bacon said.

Bacon said he hoped one returning player in particular would get more playing time.

"I hope Swartzendruber sees a lot of time," Bacon said.

"He's got excellent ball-handling skills, and I think he has the potential to be a good player and a good leader," he said.

Coach Asbury keys on recruiting

'extremely, cautiously optimistic' — Tom Asbury

Todd Stewart
assistant sports editor

"Extremely, cautiously optimistic."

It took men's basketball coach Tom Asbury three words to sum up his approach to the upcoming season.

One year after finishing in the Big 8 basement in his first season as coach of the Wildcat basketball team, Asbury has brought in eight newcomers to start practices, which began with a midnight practice over the weekend.

Asbury said that despite the number of newcomers, the team has some positives.

"I do feel good about this group," Asbury said.

"They work really hard," he said.

Asbury concentrated his recruiting efforts on interior size and brought in four players over 6'8".

Asbury said his new post players will be helped with the graduation of several of the Big 8's top interior players.

"We did lose a few of the bangers that banged our brains in last year," Asbury said.

"So maybe we're on a little more equal footing," he said.

Asbury said he hoped that would help the Cats improve in the Big 8, which he said could have been initially underrated as a conference.

"I said last year I thought the Big 8 was tougher than a lot of people thought," Asbury said.

"The conference was very, very strong," Asbury said.

But with new players, Asbury said, come new unknowns.

"We did lose a few of the bangers that banged our brains in last year."

TOM ASBURY
K-STATE MEN'S BASKETBALL COACH

"This team has got more question marks hanging over it," he said.

"How quickly they can come around, I don't know," Asbury said.

Asbury said the key, however, is to recruit good players.

He said programs in the Big 8 must bring in quality players each and every year or the conference will fall behind.

"You better bring in good players every year," Asbury said, "or you're going to be in trouble."

The concept of getting good players, Asbury said, is not a complicated one.

"This isn't rocket science," he said. "You've got to have them."

Iowa State coach dislikes homecoming foe

■ Scheduling does not favor a Cyclone win

Associated Press

AMES, Iowa— Iowa State coach Dan McCarney likes everything about homecoming.

He likes the floats, the pep rallies, the alumni coming back and the general enthusiasm of the whole week. About the only thing he doesn't like is Iowa State's opponent.

Homecoming foes are supposed to be teams you can beat. Iowa State has to play No. 9 Colorado on Saturday. "We've got to do a better job in the future about bringing in homecoming opponents," McCarney said Tuesday.

Although McCarney laughed as he spoke, he knows his team has a serious challenge ahead. He'll try to get his players into the spirit of things by taking them to a pep rally on Friday night.

"It's very special. It's important," McCarney said.

"I know a lot of alums will be back. In fact, I may try to talk Stensrud and Randall into playing a few downs for us this weekend."

That would be Mike Stensrud and Tom Randall, who were outstanding linemen at Iowa State in the 1970s and later played in the NFL.

The Cyclones will have to make do with their regular crew, however, and McCarney said they should be eager to play after a poor performance in a 34-7 loss at No. 7 Kansas last week.

"The biggest motivator for us right now should be to come back and improve on our play at Kansas," he said.

"We didn't play good football down there. I don't want to take anything away from Kansas. They're an outstanding Top-10 football team."

"They had a lot to do with the problems we had."

"But we've got to play better. We've got to play with a more consistent effort and be more productive."

McCarney said the Cyclones didn't look like the same team that had played so well against Oklahoma only a week earlier.

Iowa State led 26-23 in the fourth quarter for that game before losing 39-26.

"I've gotten a lot of letters about the real heart the team showed against Oklahoma and so many of the other games this year," McCarney said. "I just don't think we played that way down at Kansas."

"That's my responsibility because I'm in charge of this thing."

"And to have any chance to compete with a great team like Colorado, that's exactly the way we've got to come out from the first snap here Saturday."

Kickoff return specialist Jahi Arnold said he's confident the team will bounce back.

"There's a bunch of great guys on the team," Arnold said.

"We're a big family. We always pull together through our good times and bad times. I think this week we're going to pull together, work hard in practice and have fun out there. I think it'll show on Saturday."

One player in particular who needs to come back strong is quarterback Todd Doxzon.

Doxzon completed only 11 of 28 passes at Kansas, was intercepted twice and several times appeared not to see open receivers.

The first interception ended a good drive for the Cyclones on their opening possession.

Linebacker Dick Holt returned it 52 yards, setting up a Kansas touchdown. It was downhill for Iowa State after that.

"I think he's got the character and the fiber inside of him — exactly what competitors are made of — and he'll definitely bounce back," McCarney said.

"And he has to. He's got to play a better game, like we all do as a football team this week."

"Fortunately, many times players are more resilient than coaches are, and they'll come back a little faster. We're hoping that will happen this week."

After the Colorado homecoming game the Cyclones will host Oklahoma State, travel to Nebraska, host K-State and finish out its regular season at Missouri.

Sports in Kansas no longer the laughing matter it once was

Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo.— They used to joke in the Midwest that the worst thing that can happen to any football team is to have Kansas in its name.

This year, it's a mark of excellence.

K-State, the losingest program in big-time college football history, is 6-0 and ranked No. 8 in this week's Associated Press poll, an all-time high for the Wildcats.

Kansas is 6-0 for the first time since 1968, the last year the Jayhawks went to an important bowl, and ranked No. 7.

And the Kansas City Chiefs, who totaled eight victories the two years before Marty Schottenheimer arrived in 1989 and hadn't won a post-season game in 19 years, are 6-1 for the first time since their Super Bowl season of 1969.

Schottenheimer, who's become friends with both K-State coach Bill Snyder and Kansas coach Glen Mason, believes all three will remember this season as one of their most gratifying.

"Those are the things that are a hell of a lot more important than winning games," Schottenheimer said Tuesday. "You carry that forever. The fact that you were a part of building something. You carry that with you the rest of your life."

Many in the capacity crowd of 78,000 at Arrowhead Stadium last Sunday wore shirts in support of all three resurgent football programs with Kansas in their name.

"The most satisfying to me personally is what a team's success does for the community," Schottenheimer said. "That's lasting. The feeling you get from being a part of that, nobody can take away from you. Fifteen years from now, if I'm still alive God willing, I'll still have that with me."

"You may have to go back in the record book and find out how many games you won in any given year. But that feeling you get as being a part of something like that, that's the most meaningful thing."

Denver's 27-0 victory over Oakland on Monday night leaves the Chiefs with the best record in the AFC heading into their game Sunday at Denver.

Mile High Stadium has historically been one of the toughest places for the Chiefs to play. Their come-from-behind victory in Denver on a Monday night last year snapped an 11-game Kansas City losing streak in Mile High Stadium.

"I don't think winning there last year will have any impact on this one at all," Schottenheimer said.

"A lot of people pay attention to the altitude and what's gone on in years past."

"But we'll just have to put pressure on John Elway. That's one reason he likes playing out of the shotgun (formation). You can blitz him and he sees it coming. That happened last night."

Volleyball team to take on WSU Shockers

■ 14-5 Cat team travels to face 15-6 Shockers

Shana Howell
staff writer

Coming off a Big 8 win against Kansas, the K-State volleyball team will compete at 7 tonight at Levitt Arena in Wichita.

K-State, now 14-5 overall and 2-3 in the Big 8, faces the Wichita State Shockers, a team the Cats defeated 15-6, 15-12, 15-6 at the KSU Invitational last month.

The Shockers enter the contest with a 15-6 overall record and 5-8 in the Missouri Valley Conference.

Wichita State finds itself in a must-win frame of mind, as it is involved in a four-team race for the sixth playoff berth in the MVC tournament.

Although the Shockers need to win this game, K-State coach Jim Moore said he was not concerned about his opponents.

"We need to take care of ourselves and worry about what we can do," Moore said.

The Shockers return home after a three-match road trip, where the team was able to win only one match. They defeated Evansville Saturday in five games. Tonight's match is equally important to the Cats.

The match against Wichita State and Saturday's contest against Missouri are important to the team as confidence-builders, Moore said.

"We need this week to build our confidence and use it to get ready for Iowa State and Oklahoma next week," he said.

The Big 8 is seeing a tight race for third place happening, and it is vital for the team to pull ahead in the second half of the season, Moore said.

Senior setter Kori Rosenkranz is the player to beat. Rosenkranz recently became WSU's all-time career ace leader with 164 after pounding out seven service aces last weekend against Evansville.

K-State fans can expect to see senior hitter Jill Dugan, junior middle blocker Kate DeClerk, freshman middle blocker Val Wieck and sophomore setter Devon Rynning take the court against the Shockers.

On the season, Dugan leads the Wildcat defense with 233 digs and 11 solo blocks. DeClerk and Wieck lead the team in block assists with 91 and 66 respectively.

Offensively, Dugan has 28 service aces on the season, second only to Rynning, who has 29. DeClerk also leads the team offensively, hitting .401 with 220 kills. Wieck contributes substantially to the offense, hitting .352 with 117 kills.

Rynning has 874 set assists this season, making her the second best in Big 8 assists.

Union serves spicy, authentic cuisine

Jeremy Crabtree
staff reporter

Adding a little spice to your life could be as easy as walking into the Union Stateroom.

Spicy foods from Mexico and Puerto Rico are being served during lunch in the stateroom today and Oct. 24 and 25 in conjunction with Hispanic Heritage Month.

"Now, they can get a taste of how things are like in these countries without having to go that far out of the way," said Arlene Baiges, senior in industrial engineering and chairman of Hispanic Heritage Month.

"They just had to go to the Union on campus to get a real taste," she said.

Baiges said she donated several traditional recipes from Mexico and Puerto Rico to Union Food Services.

"We tried to give them recipes that have ingredients that are easy to get," Baiges said. "That way, it would be easy for them to make it and serve it in the hot line."

Barbara Depew, production manager for Food Services, said this is the first time the Union has tried Baiges' recipes.

"It will be interesting to see how people liked the new recipe," she said.

Today's menu includes tortilla de papas and a Mexican casserole with potatoes, and a caramel custard will be available for dessert.

"A lot of people probably think Hispanic food is spicy, but that's not always true. Every area has its own variations, and everything isn't the same," Baiges said.

Unlike enchiladas, the casserole is something the Union has never served before, Depew said.

"It's an interesting version of a casserole," Depew said. "We've never had it here before so it's something very new to us. There were some ingredients that we couldn't find substitutes for, and we've adapted it for the Stateroom."

If students miss out today, they will be able to get another taste next Tuesday and Wednesday.

"Next week, we will have chicken asopó. Then we will have a rice vegetable dish that has pork in it. These are some ideas that we've also never served before."

Baiges said she hopes a lot of people won't miss out on the opportunity to try the food.

"I think it does make a big difference," Baiges said. "It will give students something different and new that they won't get every day."

Celebrating Hispanic Heritage

Hispanic studies enrich life

■ Speaker focuses on Latin American studies

Claudette Riley
staff reporter

Latin American Studies affect the everyday lives of K-State students, a speaker for Hispanic Heritage Month said Tuesday.

"Kansas, for those of you who are not familiar, used to be a border state with Mexico. Now Mexico seems so far away," said Marcial Antonio Riquelme, associate professor of sociology and director of the Latin American Studies Program. "Four percent of Kansas is Spanish, with Dodge City and Garden City having the highest concentrated populations."

Riquelme discussed the definition of the Latin American region and the word Hispanic to a group of more than 40 people. He defined countries south of the Rio Grande River and the Caribbean as the area of study for Latin American secondary majors.

"The word Hispanic, which is a census category, pertains to people from Spanish-speaking countries and excludes Haitians which speak French, and Brazil, whose native language is Portuguese," Riquelme said. "The term Hispanic is less inclusive than the term Latin Americans."

About 49 percent of all students learning a foreign language in North America choose to study Spanish, Riquelme said.

"The U.S. is the fifth-largest Spanish-speaking country in the world after Mexico, Spain, Argentina and Colombia," Riquelme said. "There is a need to accommodate the needs of the Hispanic population in this country and within this institution."

Graduate and employment-related work opportunities are available for students who pursue undergraduate degrees in Latin American studies, Riquelme said.

Students interested in earning a secondary degree in Latin American studies are required to complete a senior seminar and take four semesters of Spanish and 21 hours in Latin American studies, with no more than nine hours in any one discipline.

Riquelme said an interdisciplinary program like Latin American studies can benefit Kansas students.

Carmen Sanchez, junior in civil engineering and president of Hispanic American Leadership Organization, said he hopes students understand what Hispanic studies are available to them.

"We wanted to inform people of the issues which concern Hispanics in general," Sanchez said. "We also wanted to introduce the public to the variety of classes available in Latin American studies."

Arleen Baiges, senior in industrial engineering, said she wants students to understand that some Latin American countries have agreements with K-State.

Kansas has been a sister state to the republic of Paraguay for over 25 years and exchanges students, she said.

"I also think it is important for second- and third-generation Hispanics to get in touch with their heritage," Baiges said.

Leo Prieto, freshman in pre-medicine, said he hoped attending the meeting would help his consideration of

Antibiotics may end human civilization

Heidi Evert
staff reporter

A bacterial battle for survival is taking place within the human body — every day, every hour and every minute.

Amoxicillin, penicillin, erythromycin and tetracycline have been the modern-day winners in the fight against bacteria-based viruses like colds and flus. But the antibiotics could be killing the human population.

"Some people claim that that's what is going to kill us," Shirley Ark, pharmacist at Barry's Drug Center, said. "That we're going to end up bacteria-resistant to all antibiotics."

Julian Davies, professor of microbiology and immunology at the University of British Columbia, will discuss the effect of antibiotics at 10:30 a.m. Thursday in McCain Auditorium.

His lecture, "Wonderdrugs and Superbugs," will focus on the development of drug-resistant strains of bacteria and how they affect the human population. Davies will also talk about how antibiotics should be used to protect humans and livestock against infectious disease.

Robert Robel, professor of environmental biology, said bacteria are becoming resistant to many modern drugs.

"Without the availability of effective antibiotics, there will be nothing available to stop the spreading of infectious diseases," Robel said.

Robel said Davies looks at the mechanism of the bacteria that allows them to become resistant to the antiotic.

Davies

After finding the mechanism, Davies can then determine how to modify the antibiotics so the bacteria cannot become resistant to them.

Davies is a world-renowned authority on drug-resistant bacteria. He has dedicated his lifetime to researching this problem.

"Davies is probably the most knowledgeable person in the world on antibiotic resistance of bacteria," Robel said.

Davies has had academic positions at the University of Manchester, Harvard Medical School, University of Wisconsin and the University of Geneva.

REVIEW

Pictures painted with music

Claudette Riley
staff writer

Brigitte Engerer's performance Tuesday at McCain Auditorium was animated storytelling guided by the refined style and brilliancy of the pianist.

Even as quiet steps foretold her arrival, the mature woman steadied herself and moved from beyond the blackness and obligingly resigned herself to the language of the grand piano.

Each keystroke coursed through her, and the understanding showed itself to be human in her expression.

Engerer, performing and pacing her effect, allowed the arch of her shoulders and the placement of her hands to emote the language of the chosen pieces.

The turmoil of Engerer's early Franz Liszt and Schubert pieces were broken in the race to achieve some conclusion. Her movement through each selection was spaced within the emotional moment of what she wished to share with her audience.

Engerer's rendition of Schubert's "Fantasie in C Major" was certain. She balanced between a menacing and coy playfulness. At other times, it played like a the fury of agonized conversation between two stubborn forces.

Her ending section of Modest Petrovich Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" began with the solemn steps of gallery strolling. The "Promenade" movement separated the sketches encountered on the stroll.

The gentle beauty of "Gnomus" painted an audible scene easily transcending the hues of the portrait depicted.

In "Tuleries," Engerer found an almost childlike pleasure that derived from the speed and capriciousness of the piece which tickled breezy smiles from the listeners.

The tantalizing power of her performance allowed the audience to be swept into the currents and sub-currents of her musical dialogue.

The intelligent convictions and passionate power of Engerer's selections taps faintly on the breastplate and demands and audience with the heart.

An evening under the spell of Engerer, a sensitive pianist, was like wading deeply in the fires and calms available through the world of the imagination.

The band formerly known by the names of Spine and Puke Weasel has changed its name again after band members discovered the name Spine was trademarked by a band in Washington, D.C. Pictured from left to right are the members of the newly renamed band, Scully: Mike Custer, guitarist; Dave Boomer, bassist; Andrew Sample, vocalist; Alan Keithley, drummer; and Dave Minner, guitarist.

MUSIC

'70s rock bands influence Scully

contributing writer

They make up one of the most intimidating, thriving bands in Manhattan. They have just released their fourth album. And opportunity is knocking on their Midwestern metal door.

They are the guys who make up Scully, formerly Spine, formerly Puke Weasel.

As a result of legal conflicts with Washington, D.C., band already possessing a trademark on the name Spine, the band is making the transition to Scully.

The name has three known slang definitions, including a term meaning fellatio, preparation for a fight and things of or relating to the skull, depending on local dialect.

The band members, while exchanging mischievous smirks, refused to claim any of these definitions as the reason for choosing the name.

Although they appear vicious and avenging while "in uniform," off stage, they appear to be five laid-back and harmlessly self-entertained beings content with their Sonic chili dogs and stories of their trip this summer to the New York College Music Journal festival.

Scully was one of 75 metal bands among 400 bands, about half of which were signed to a label, performing at the four-day festival.

"The purpose is for new talent recently signed and new and independent bands to showcase their talent," Andrew Sample, vocalist, said.

The band remains dedicated and tight despite the near loss of Alan Keithley through an opportunity that surfaced at the CMJ festival.

Keithley had a chance to tour internationally with Machine Head, an Oakland, Calif.-based band signed to Road Runner records.

"It would have been a tough decision," Keithley said. "It's been five years now, and I have a lot of loyalties to the band."

Keithley was one of the founding members of the original Puke Weasel, along with Dave Boomer on bass.

Both have witnessed the adolescence and development of the sound, still sustaining the integrity of their original influences.

"It's gotten a lot more technical," Boomer said. "We've always been pretty metal, but now we take a lot of old riffs and make them more interesting."

Sample said most of their influences are diverse, older and more conventional metal from the 1970s. "It's a lot of '70s heavy rock, Cheap Trick, KISS, Black Sabbath and old AC/DC," he said.

Scully has three releases on an independent label under the name Puke Weasel. The band's latest Spine release, "Disruptive Influence," spent six weeks on the college charts, holding at 62.

"Disruptive Influence" is the band's third release and has gone to Europe. The band has had offers from European distribution companies, but with the preoccupation of the name change, any plans to sign with a particular label are completely on hold.

Most of the band's members are veterans of the local scene here, taking root in a handful of various bands in Manhattan's musical family tree.

Scully guitarist Doug Minner started in Harlot, a cover band playing what they describe as "really bad cheese metal." Boomer got his start in a cover band called Fair Warning, and Keithley began in Stinger, another cover band. Guitarist Mike Custer played for Carpet Burn and was the last to be recruited.

Although the band recognizes the decline of the Manhattan music scene in the past few years, it is content to stay local.

"We realized a while ago that there wasn't going to be a scene here, so we took it upon ourselves to do something," Sample said. "We don't rely on the scene, but we have a lot of good support from our fan base here."

"We thought about getting into a larger scene, but it would put us back," he said. "It's too easy to get shows as a big fish in a small town. Here, they know they'll have a pretty decent drinking night."

Scully's members said most of the local clubs aren't willing to take the risk of paying a flat fee so local bands have to rely on what they make at the door.

"Nobody wants to do it to promote bands, and it isn't fair to the bands," Sample said. "There hasn't been a scene here for two or three years, when Moving Van Goghs and Roach Factory broke up."

"It's unfortunate because it wouldn't take much."

Scully will open for the Invisibles at 9:30 tonight at Bombers. If you're interested in an unpredictable rush and two of the most confrontational and entertaining local performances you can endure, you will not be disappointed.

The guidelines state that no expenditures pertaining to parties or social functions will be made with student monies.

Trent LeDoux, agriculture senator, challenged the decision of the chair to suspend the bill.

"Up until now, this has been shoddy management on our part. There shouldn't be this discrepancy between groups. It's not the groups' fault. It's our own," LeDoux said.

After the meeting, Potter said the guidelines have not been followed in the past and have been open to interpretation.

"There's so many holes in them you could drive a truck through. There needs to be a more specific parameter, and the guidelines need to be spelled out so the chair isn't making the decisions," Potter said.

In a 49-2 vote, members allocated $567.90 to the Black Student Union. BSU had requested $725.80, and most of the money not allocated to them was for printing costs. It requested $150 for printing, and a ceiling of $17.50 has been set by Senate for all organizations' printing costs.

Students for Sustainability received $1,585.70 of the $1,640.10 it requested. The money not allocated to them was for postage and advertising.

After much discussion about whether requested funds were going to be used for a conference or convention, Senate allocated the Young Democrats $1,160 in a 44-10 vote.

A 52-4 vote granted $1903.80 to the Hispanic American Leadership Organization. The money will be used for two projects for Latino Cultural Night and a speaker.

Army officials crack down on disrespect of Old Glory

Associated Press

FREDERICK, Md. — Some soldiers and civilians at the Army base here duck into buildings to avoid saluting Old Glory.

Others have shouted obscenities at those who stop to observe the flag-lowering ceremony. Some even claim not to know what's required of them.

The commander of Fort Detrick views it all as an affront to those men and women who fought under the red-white-and-blue. And he's cracking down.

Sgt. Maj. David Faiello has ordered military police to warn any of the base's 4,700 soldiers and civilian base employees who disregard Army policy during the solemn flag-lowering ceremony, held every day at twilight.

Faiello took the action after his call for respect was largely ignored — his articles on the topic appeared in the base's newspaper.

"He was upset by it," base spokesperson Norm Covert said. "He served and others served in uniform fighting for that flag and it deserves our respect. People do it at baseball games."

At 5 p.m. every day, a cannon is fired on the first note of "To the Colors," and the flag is slowly lowered during a ceremony that lasts about a minute. As the music starts, Covert said, civilians and soldiers are required to stop and turn toward the flag. Soldiers are required to salute, civilians to hold their hand over their heart.

Cars should also stop and their occupants should get out and observe the ceremony, he said.

Faiello has ordered that four officers be posted at intersections around the base to stop cars during the ceremony, and that they should take note of the license plates of those who don't stop.

He also has instructed military police to issue verbal warnings to violators and educate those who claim not to know about the policy.

"We had an incident recently when a military driver stopped his car and got out to salute and several drivers behind him got very angry and shouted obscenities at him," Faiello said in a recent base newspaper article. "There is just no excuse for this."

Officers have not begun issuing written citations, which would require violators to receive counseling from their supervisors, Covert said, but that could start if infractions continue.

"I don't think some people are ignoring it as much as they don't know what's going on," Covert said. "Then, there are always those in a hurry to go pick up their child at day care."

Spc. LaShawn Brown, who is on the flag detail, said a few more people have been showing respect for the flag, and some have gone to extremes to get around it.

"A lot of people try to hide," Brown said. "They duck back in the buildings."

Pvt. Les Castillo said people just don't feel like doing it.

Compliance, however, appeared strong on Monday evening.

Seven soldiers playing football stopped and came to attention.

CIVIL RIGHTS

Black man sues Boston police

Associated Press

BOSTON — Revisiting a painful episode in Boston's racial history, a black man falsely accused as a suspect in the slaying of a pregnant white woman is suing the police for allegedly violating his civil rights.

Police were so hot to solve the murder that they pressured teen-agers to identify William Bennett as the man who killed Carol DiMaiti Stuart, Bennett's lawyer Steven Rappaport told a federal jury Tuesday. Carol Stuart was shot as she left a childbirth class with her husband in October 1989.

"What this case focuses on is (police) attempts and agreements amongst themselves ... to pin the rap on William Bennett," Rappaport said. "In fact, they did coerce certain witnesses."

A lawyer for the five officers being sued countered that there was plenty of reason to suspect Bennett, a career criminal, including testimony from two teen-agers who said they heard

Bennett's nephew brag about his uncle's role in the crime.

"It is his purpose to get money from you, money that he does not deserve," attorney Chris Muse said. The police officers, he said, do not deserve to be punished for doing their job.

Bennett, 45, is seeking unspecified damages.

When Carol Stuart was slain, her husband, Charles Stuart, claimed a black robber forced his way into their car, shot him and his wife from the back seat, then fled into the night with cash and jewelry.

Employing heavyhanded tactics that raised racial tensions in Boston, police scoured the mostly black Mission Hill neighborhood near the murder scene. Hundreds of young black men were stopped and frisked. Doors were kicked in. Suspects were strip-searched.

Stuart picked Bennett out of a lineup, and Bennett was identified in the media as the prime suspect in November 1989.

But Bennett was never charged. The case was dropped when Matthew Stuart revealed that his elder brother had killed his wife for the insurance money. Charles Stuart apparently committed suicide in 1990 when he jumped off a bridge into the Mystic River.

In the aftermath, police were accused of accepting too readily Stuart's claim that the killer was a black man.

State and federal reports on the investigation condemned police for their search tactics, and accused officers of widespread civil-rights abuses. No charges were ever filed against police.

Bennett is five years into a 12-to-25-year prison sentence for holding up a video store. He was also previously convicted of shooting and robbing a double amputee.

During the Stuart investigation, at least two youths, Derek Jackson and Eric Whitney, pointed to Bennett.

SCHOOL FIRE

Jury selection continues in arson case

Associated Press

MONTGOMERY, Ala. — Potential jurors were asked their attitudes about social problems as trial opened Tuesday for a black man accused of burning down a high school where the principal criticized interracial dating.

Asked what they would most like to change in society, most members of the jury pool at Christopher Lynn Johnson's arson trial said they would like to strengthen families and put more criminals, particularly drug dealers, behind bars.

A large number of potential jurors also stood up when asked if they were familiar with the case, which drew widespread attention to the rural east Alabama town of Wedowee.

Johnson was charged in federal court with burning down Randolph County High School in Wedowee on Aug. 4, 1994, after weeks of racial protests over the principal's stand against interracial dating at the spring prom.

The principal, Hulond Humphries, who is white, eventually was moved to an administrative job, and the school district settled a lawsuit brought by the

Drug may help breast cancer sufferers

Associated Press

SILVER SPRING, Md. — The new drug Taxotere should be approved to help prolong the lives of dying breast cancer patients who have exhausted other options, despite its high incidence of dangerous side effects, a government panel recommended Tuesday.

If the Food and Drug Administration follows the advice, Taxotere would become the first competition for the widely used Taxol, which until now has been the last hope for many of these women.

Manufacturer Rhone-Poulenc Rorer presented tantalizing hints that Taxotere might even work better than Taxol, something it hopes to prove in a comparison of the two drugs now under way. Regardless, the FDA advisory committee said early evidence indicates Taxotere is effective enough to let women begin taking it before final testing — usually a requirement for a drug approval — is finished.

"This is a population with very few options," said Dr. Arlene Forastiere of Johns Hopkins University.

"What I need is time, and what I need are options," said Paula Flowers of Fort Walton Beach, Fla., who at 29 has battled for six years against advanced breast cancer that spread to her eyes, lungs and bone. Experimental use of Taxotere appears to have stalled her disease for now.

The FDA isn't bound by advisory committee decisions but usually follows them.

Taxol, made by competitor Bristol-Myers Squibb, was the first drug to fight tumors by acting on the internal skeleton of cancer cells to prevent them from dividing and thus kill them. Taxotere, known generically as docetaxel, aims to be the second drug in this class and chemically is very similar to Taxol.

Rhone-Poulenc gave Taxotere to 134 advanced breast cancer patients whose disease resisted standard chemotherapy.

Almost half had cancer that had spread to at least three organs.

Some 43 percent were alive a year later, and three experienced a remission. Median survival — meaning half did better and half worse — was 10 months, although some patients survived for 24.

Previous tests of the rival Taxol given to similar patients showed just 21 percent responded, Rhone-Poulenc said. However, it acknowledged that a head-to-head comparison, now under way, is necessary to prove that difference.

But Taxotere had troubling side effects, and 23 of 1,070 patients worldwide have died from them, the company said. Most at risk were women with liver trouble, signaled by elevated enzymes, which meant their bodies couldn't metabolize the drug well. The FDA panel recommended that women with such liver trouble not be given Taxotere.

Patients with normal livers suffered dangerous side effects too: 22 percent had an extremely suppressed immune system with fever, 7 percent had severe infections, and 9.7 percent had severe fluid retention. Risk of death was about 1 percent.

Still, those risks are acceptable because of the drug's potential benefit, the panel agreed.

Rhone-Poulenc gave every patient Taxotere, meaning it didn't have to hold its own against a proven therapy, the more rigorous type of test the FDA usually requires. The company sought special permission to have Taxotere judged early, but pledged to finish those "gold standard" tests once Taxotere is on the market so doctors will know how to use it properly.

The biggest question those tests will answer is what dose to use. Rhone-Poulenc used 100 milligrams per square meter of body size in test patients, but a new Japanese study suggests 60 milligrams might be enough to get some benefit without the side effects.

VIRTUAL

the user wants, giving the game a taste of reality.

For example, the player on an elevator in the game and looks up and sees the view of moving up an elevator shaft.

Kramer International, a company based in Grand Rapids, Mich., sends the machines and proctors to do setups on campuses, said Vanderbaan.

UPC Special Events sponsored the chance for people of all ages to discover the world of virtual reality.

"We had it last year," said Janine Roney, chairman of UPC Special Events Committee.

"This year, it's supposed to be bigger and better, so we requested them back," Roney said.

The entire cost to have the two virtual reality machines along with the three people to setup and run them was $2,000, said Sarah Hadley, program adviser for the Union.

To keep costs down, events like this one are usually scheduled to go to neighboring colleges.

This allows all the schools to share the costs, she said.

One of the biggest difficulties with a setup like this is that the students don't get a chance to practice the games.

Like the carneys of the midway, the game supervisors can beat the games without even breaking a sweat.

Virtual reality will probably be the next generation of game systems to hit the home market. Already companies are offering watered-down simulators to plug into computers.

Virtual reality has applications beyond games, as well.

Today's surgeons use virtual reality to enhance their operating skills during surgery, and training courses of all types can get as real as possible with virtual reality, making it much more than just an expensive toy, Vanderbaan said.

"What we do in virtual reality, in a sense, is just entertainment, and it's just a small part of what's out there," he said.

GANG VIOLENCE

Teen fatally shot after running away from home

Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Thirteen-year-old Wendy Macias ran away from home seeking a better life. A day later, she called her mother to come and get her. Within minutes, she was shot dead by a stray bullet meant for a gang member.

The very streets Wendy had tried to escape had claimed her life.

Maria Macias drove up to the corner just as the ambulance carrying her daughter was pulling away.

"She was really scared about the neighborhood she was in," Wendy's mother said, fighting back tears. "I got there late."

Wendy ran away from her home in Athens, a community 12 miles south of downtown Los Angeles, after arguing with her father on Saturday. The next afternoon, she called police, and they temporarily placed her in a children's home.

She told the officers she wanted to get far away from the drugs and violence that plague many Los Angeles neighborhoods.

"Wendy came to us and the exact words that she told us was that she wanted a better way for herself," police Sgt. Alexander Gomez said. "She wanted a better life, than, you know, the gangs, the violence, the drugs."

"She wanted to get away — as far away from that as possible. Unfortunately, the very thing that she wanted to get away from was the very thing that took her life," Gomez said.

The youngster had left home and gone to the city's rough South Central neighborhood. She had just finished talking with her mother from a pay phone Sunday and had called a friend when she was shot, sheriff's Deputy Benita Nichol said.

A man police described as an 18-year-old gang member took a shot at two rivals, and Wendy got caught in the crossfire. No arrests were made, although authorities were searching for a gunman they did not further identify.

Asian-American for Intercultural Awareness received $1,541.70 for Asian-American Awareness Month. An original request for $2,209.84 was rejected in a 51-5 vote.

Again, the largest cuts came in printing, advertising and postage. Most of the cuts were due to ceilings previously set by Senate.

The Students for Peace and Justice was allocated the $2,120 it had requested. The money will go toward projects to bring three speakers to campus.

First readings for 10 other groups were then read.

The Allocation Committee recommended $270 for Secret Master of Fandom in the allocations bill. The group had requested $1,170. Most was to be used to rent equipment and space and for conference expenses and a card game tournament, and some would be going for social activities.

Environmental Professionals requested $1,584.50, and $1,413.80 was recommended.

A recommendation of $95.50 was made for Students for Disability Awareness. It had requested $137.30.

Native American Student Body

Association was recommended $2,672.50 after a request of $4384.60. Printing costs, rent of space, advertising and postage were cut.

After requesting $1,650, Students Advocating a Valid Education was recommended $556.90. A $700 instructional video project was not funded because it would not directly affect students.

Bangladesh Student Association received a recommendation for $856.30.

It had requested $2,500. A plane ticket for a speaker, rent of space charges and a Welcome/Farewell May Graduation, which was which was deemed to be a social function, were cut.

The Costa Rican Student Organization bill was referred back to the Allocations Committee because it did not have enough information about the event request, Chris Avila, Allocations chairman, said.

India Student Association requested $3815.70 and was recommended $2,295.71.

The International Club received a recommendation for $1,421.30. It had requested $1,760.70.

Muslim Student Association received a recommendation for all of the $1,403.80 it requested.

MANHATTAN TOWN CENTER

Manhattan considers refinancing

Nikola Zytrow
staff writer

Fearing a future foreclosure of the Manhattan Town Center, the company that manages the mall has requested the city commission allow it to remarket the mall's revenue bonds.

At Tuesday night's city commission meeting, Forest City, a company that manages the mall, proposed the outstanding Manhattan mall industrial revenue bonds be purchased from the current bond holder and remarketed.

Lennar Northeast Partnership has $19 million in mall bonds. By refinancing the bonds, Forest City is looking for a lower interest rate on the bonds. Prospective buyers include FirstBank, BC Christopher Co., and Crews and Associates.

The revenue bonds were sold to fund the building of the mall, which opened in 1987.

"The interest rate is low, the economy is doing well, and there are prospective buyers. The time to remarket the bonds is now," Curt Wood, city finance director, said.

Forest City, which manages 20 other U.S. malls, wants to buy the bonds from Lennar for $17.5 million, Wood said. If the company waits until 1997, the cost would go up to $18.8 million.

If the commission decides not to let the bonds be remarketed, Forest City could be in trouble. In 1997, Lennar could exercise a put option. This option would allow Lennar to force Forest City to pay the bonds off immediately.

Forest City would have the option of paying the bonds back or finding another buyer for the bonds.

If Forest City decided not to pay the bonds back or remarket them, Lennar could foreclose on the mall, Wood said. With no management system, the mall would be owned by the bond owner, which could potentially close the mall down.

"Forest City is an exceptional manager," Wood said. "If someone else were to manage the mall, there would be no telling on what changes could occur."

In the case of a foreclosure, tenants could leave, resulting in a loss of jobs and city income from property and sales taxes.

The commission said Tuesday if it were to let Forest City remarket the bonds, it would want to make significant revisions to the land lease agreement. One of the revisions suggested was to make mall owners start paying their own rent.

The mall's rent, $185,000 per year, is being paid by

Dancing to a different beat

Tonya Bobbitt
staff reporter

About 50 people swung their hips to the fast-paced beat at the Salsa and Merengue Dance Workshop Wednesday night.

The workshop, which was part of Hispanic Heritage Month, gave people a chance to learn how to dance to Latin American music. Arleen Baiges, chairperson for the Hispanic Heritage Month, said. The salsa and merengue are two popular Latin American dances.

"This workshop helps people learn how to dance for the Latin American Dance that we have during the year, which is called the Gran Baile," Baiges said. "They like the workshop because they can learn steps and enjoy themselves more at the party."

Baiges said this is the fourth year the workshop has been taught, and usually the workshop is before a dance.

Katrisha Thomas, sophomore in apparel and textile marketing, said the workshop helped her build confidence.

"I always go to Latino night, but I'm not really good at dancing," she said. "Now, I think I will be more confident."

Mike Bennett, non-degree undergraduate in pre-professional secondary education, and Sara Saunders, sophomore in elementary education, taught the Salsa and Merengue Workshop. The couple also teach ballroom dancing for the University for Mankind.

"I learned how to teach the salsa and merengue by attending the Dance workshop last year," Saunders said. "I love teaching it because it's so much fun and I want everyone to learn it."

The two dances are basically a combination of three basic steps, Saunders said.

The movie step is one of the basic steps and is labeled for its sideways action. An example would be if you need to pass people who are seated in a movie theater so that you can make your way to the bathroom.

The next step is the triple step. This step is the same as the movie step, but the student moves to the side in three steps.

The last basic step is called the rock step. Students begin to march, step forward with their left foot and then step back. Finally, students alternate their feet.

Aerobics is a healthy time for the body and mind.

"I feel I have a role in other's lives, and it makes me feel good when I'm helping people. I want the students to stick with their exercise program, and to do what they have to do to have fun while they work out so they will come back," Michelle Bishop, senior in nutrition and exercise science and aerobics instructor at Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

She began taking aerobics classes at age 14, when she joined a health club, and gradually became interested in teaching the classes.

Bishop voiced her interest to the aerobics director and was allowed to try out. She taught a small part of a routine for the director and took a muscle group and safety test.

After she was hired at the age of 16, an instructor worked with her on basic steps and was present when she taught to offer suggestions.

"I was so nervous the first time I taught. I didn't know you were supposed to be on eight counts. The whole class was off and the other instructor was yelling the eight counts to me, but I didn't know why," Bishop said.

There are several organizations throughout the nation that certify instructors. Two of the most widely accepted are the American Council on Exercise and the American College of Sports Medicine. Susan McNellis, manager of the Ladies Club, said.

"We prefer our instructors to be certified by A.C.E. and to have prior teaching experience. But it depends on the person, some are already certified, and some become certified within a few months of teaching at the club," McNellis said.

At the Rec Complex, national certification is not a requirement for instructors, Bishop said.

"I'm not nationally certified, but I have an in-house certification from Exertech in Wichita. It's like A.C.E., but it's a condensed program. Exertech had

SEARCH CONTINUES FOR SUSPECTS IN OCT. 8 RAPE

Riley County Investigators are continuing the search for two suspects who raped a 23-year-old Roeland Park woman in Manhattan Oct. 8.

Investigators have questioned a possible suspect who was said to have been in the area when the rape occurred, said Capt. Steve French of the Riley County Investigations Division.

The victim told investigators she knew the man, and she denied his involvement in the assault, he said.

On Oct. 8, the victim was raped inside the Sigma Chi fraternity house between 4 and 4:26 a.m. Two men followed the victim into the house and brought her into a room off of the foyer where the assault occurred, French said.

There is indication that only one of the suspects raped the victim while the other was a look out, he said.

Both suspects are described as black men in their early 20s with short, cropped hair. They were wearing dark clothing at the time of the rape. The suspect who investigators said they believe raped the victim is about 5 feet, 8 inches tall and 180 pounds. The other suspect is about 6 feet, 1 inch and 185 pounds, French said.

Investigators completed computer-generated composites of the suspects last week, but the victim told investigators that she was not happy with them. The victim told investigators she could not do any better on the composites, French said.

He said investigators are relying on information from people calling in to Manhattan Crime Stoppers to help develop a suspect.

Contact Manhattan Crime Stoppers at 537-7777 if you have any information about the case or other cases.

Block scheduling questioned

Dana Harding
staff reporter

More than 100 parents attended the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 school board meeting Wednesday to ask questions about block scheduling.

Block scheduling reduces the number of classes a student takes per semester but increases the length of time a student spends in one class. The number of classes students would take has not yet been decided.

Students are on a six-class schedule now.

The proposed schedule would eventually affect all the district schools.

Parents presented what they believe will be the negatives of block scheduling to school board members and asked for answers to their questions about the new process.

"I am very frustrated because we have emitted a lot of concerns to the board and our concerns have not been addressed," said Nancy Knopp, hospital social worker and parent of three students.

Parents asked if teachers would be able to adapt to the new system.

"I strongly support block scheduling because we need to try to find other ways to benefit other kids who are not succeeding under the current system," said

Kim Eyer, Manhattan High School math and computer teacher.

Different styles of teaching have already been taught to many teachers during workshop training.

"We have been learning about the different learning processes of students in workshops," Eyer said. "The more flexibility the new styles offer, the more kids we are going to reach. We want to see what we can do to improve the educational environment."

Board members said concerns of parents could not be answered at this time because the board has not finalized the block-scheduling proposal.

ARMY EXPERTS DETERMINE OFFICIAL-LOOKING MISSILE JUST A MODEL

LEVEL PLAINS, Ala. (AP) — Word that a live U.S. Air Force rocket had slammed into a backyard shed got this community of 2,000 scrambling Tuesday. The block was evacuated, an Army bomb squad was called in, and police fretted about detonation. It turned out the weapon was a model covered with decals. "We're just glad it was a toy," court clerk Marsha Neagley said. "You just never know these days."

The hullabaloo began when Adrian Ashworth found a cylindrical, 18-inch, finned white projectile protruding from his shed.

He alerted authorities because of its official-looking decals, thinking it could have been fired from Eglin Air Force Base, about 100 miles southwest.

After about four hours, specialists from Fort Benning, Ga., determined it posed no danger, spokesman Rich McDowell said.

"I thought it was a hobby rocket, but I didn't know for sure," Ashworth said after the all-clear. "I wish whoever fired it would come up and patch the hole in the roof."

GOVERNOR ADOPTS BABY GIRL

TOPEKA — Pink-and-white signs proclaiming "It's a girl" sprang up Wednesday on the grounds of the Statehouse and at Cedar Crest, the official governor's mansion.

Meanwhile, Gov. Bill Graves and his wife, Linda, were sleeping in shifts at their home in Mission Hills and taking care of their new daughter, Katherine Preston Graves, born earlier this month.

The Graves became parents last Saturday through adoption.

This is their first child.

"Katie is everything we hoped and prayed for," Linda Graves said in a statement issued by the governor's press office.

"She is a happy, healthy baby, and full of life. We are thankful, overjoyed and sleeping in shifts."

Linda Graves has made no secret about her problems with infertility and her medical treatment for it.

Mike Matson, the governor's press secretary, said the couple has been trying to have a baby since they were married in April 1990.

Katie measured 21 inches and weighed 8 pounds and 1 ounce at birth.

Her parents report that her most distinguishing feature are her long hands and feet.

Matson declined to say when or where the child was born.

"There are guidelines that are put in place for every adoption for confidentiality," Matson said.

No photographs of the baby are available at this time, he said.

Particularly elated was the state's second in command, Lt. Gov. Sheila Frahm, herself an adoptive parent.

"Isn't that wonderful," said Frahm, who acts as a spokesperson for a Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services adoption program.

"That's the good news for the day."

Frahm and her husband, Ken, adopted their 15-year-old daughter, Chrissie, at birth.

Set designers strive for simplicity

Set construction

Jeni Pruitt
staff reporter

They don't want your applause. They'd be more than happy if you walk out of McCain Auditorium after the "Music Man" without noticing their 500 hours of work.

Don't take it personally — it's their job. The set designers and constructors have only three weeks to finish six scenes with more than 50 pieces for the "Music Man's" opening night on Nov. 16.

And if you thought designing the costumes was hard, just wait until you see what goes on inside the scenery-construction garage in McCain.

"Dana (the costume designer) said the costumers had it the hardest," David Centers, head of design, said with a devilish grin.

"They're on a gravy train. It's a cake walk compared with our work."

Yet Centers would be the first to admit his reliance on the other facets of the production. In fact, he'd prefer the construction crew's work to go unnoticed.

"The last thing I want is for the people to walk out of the show remembering the scenery," he said. "If that happens, then we haven't done our job as a collaborative crew."

Centers said he wanted the set to be simple with a naive, Americana feel to it.

By opening night, the stage will look like a pop-up storybook. Rolling hills, sunrises and tiny houses that look like squares with a triangle on top will cover the stage in layers.

A portal with intricate cutouts of the sunrise, moon and stars will surround the stage. And the muted green, tan and beige coloring of the set will look like a faded postcard.

The basic structure of the scenery, the portal and the layering of the hills, will remain on the stage to reflect the town's reluctance to change.

"It's a storybook approach that says, 'This is River City, Iowa — isn't it quaint? We are who we are, and we're never going to change,'" Centers said.

But don't let the simplicity fool you; the creation of this look was far from carefree.

In May, Centers began researching folk artists, the inspiration for his design, in Dayton, Ohio.

"I was mainly trying to get into the frame of mind like a folk artist," he said. "They just loved to paint, and they didn't get bogged down into trying to paint a realistic house."

"If Grandma Moses wanted a house, she'd put a house there. She didn't care if she only had green paint. They viewed life as carefree as possible."

Creating this carefree feel was difficult for Centers, because he is a detailed designer.

"When the show goes up, they won't have any clue it was a struggle," Centers said.

"But I had a lot of conversations with myself," Centers said. "Anybody who walked by my office would have probably thought I was crazy."

"The technical side would grab me and say, 'Keep it simple. How would Grandma

► PETS

Time to nominate that special animal for Pet of the Year

Brent Johnson
staff reporter

If your pet has done something in the past year benefiting an individual or the community, nominate it for the 1995 Pet of the Year.

The Kansas Veterinary Medical Association Inc. will be accepting nominations for the 1995 Pet of the Year Award through Oct. 27.

"To be the pet of the year, the animal doesn't have to be a hero," said Dr. William Fortney, vice president of the association. "The animal just has to be head and shoulders above the rest."

The past winners have been a search and rescue dog and a dog who woke people up when their house was on fire, Fortney said.

The winning pet and its owners receive both a trophy and a paid vacation to the association's annual convention. The upcoming convention will be Jan. 13 at the Doubletree Hotel in Overland Park.

The 1994 Pet of the Year Award went to Cookie, a Brittany, for providing a service to benefit the community. Cookie was nominated for the award for visiting nursing homes and hospitals.

"We have visited area hospitals and nursing homes biweekly for the past six years," Jeanene Hoover, Cookie's owner, said. "Cookie's presence benefits both children and the elderly, mainly by relieving loneliness."

Hoover said she and Cookie have had lots of training together as a team. This helps the team help others.

Catharine Deever, executive director for the association, said the association receives about 200-300 nominations a year.

"Mainly, the nominations come from the animals' owners, but sometimes the owners ask their veterinarian to write in and support the animal," Deever said.

Dr. Joseph Kobuszewski, awards chairman for the association, said any animal could be nominated for the award.

"While all I remember is dogs winning the award," he said, "any animal could win it."

Deever said the association has had nominations for dogs, cats and horses. One year, it had someone nominate some cattle.

"If you have a pet who has provided a distinguished service within the past year, nominate it no matter what kind of animal it is," she said. "If somebody wants to nominate a llama or an emu, they're perfectly welcome."

Phillips puts school, athletics in a bad light

We believe Lawrence Phillips has every right to continue his education, but he should not play football.

Seven weeks after assaulting his ex-girlfriend, Nebraska running back Lawrence Phillips has broken his silence.

But what he said is almost as disturbing as what he did.

"I could have just left," Phillips said in an interview with KFAB radio in Omaha, Neb.

"Many agents called me, '... We'll give you $100,000 right now. You can just wait until the draft. You probably dropped to about the 15th or 16th pick, but you'll be all right.'"

"I didn't do that. I stayed here. I'm going to go to school and try to do what's right."

While it is encouraging that Phillips admits he was wrong, the fact that the sports world is ready to welcome him back into the fold is frightening.

It is appalling that professional sports are so driven by the big green machine that they have no concern for the character of their athletes.

At the collegiate level, scholarship athletes are put in the often-uncomfortable position of acting as representatives of their school.

But considering they get their tuition, room and board paid simply for doing something they love, the price they pay is minimal.

We believe Lawrence Phillips has every right to continue his education, but he should not play football. His conviction of misdemeanor assault and trespassing makes him an unfit representative for a university.

And we appeal to student athletes at K-State and around the nation, the vast majority of whom are excellent representatives of their institutions: When you live in the limelight, a few bad apples can easily spoil the bunch. Take a look at where you are. Cherish it. And conduct yourselves in such a manner as befits your position.

BLACKS AS SUSPECTS

Editor,

It is sad that I live in a time when I have doubts in my mind on the circumstances of something as serious as rape.

As most people already know, an alleged rape occurred at one of K-State's historically white fraternity houses.

I truly feel sorry for the victim of this crime.

However, I am very uneasy about the way the Collegian has decided to release information.

There were two faults that I saw in the story that made the incident lose credibility.

I was under the assumption that when any crime takes place in America, no evidence is ever thrown out until the crime has been solved.

I guess I was wrong.

On Oct. 10, the Collegian made it clear that the house in which this serious offense took place had no ties to the event.

It was so stated the following day that the house members had no ties to the alleged rape.

I just do not understand how an investigation cannot be run without questioning all of the people surrounding an incident.

"Both suspects are described as black men in their early 20s with short cropped hair. They were wearing dark clothing at the time of the rape. The suspect who investigators said they believe raped the victim is about 5 feet, 8 inches tall and 180 pounds. The other suspect is about 6 feet, 1 inch and 185 pounds," French said."

The major problem with this description is that the following day, Oct. 11, it was reported that "Suspects unknown; composite not accurate in rape case."

However, the paper concludes with the same tired, vague description.

How can the media continue to use these vague descriptions in reports that will put one-half of all black men in jail?

That description could even fit me, even though I am a female.

I am not sure if the media understands how much harm those vague descriptions do to this society — especially to black men.

Now everyone is looking for two black guys who the police can't even make an accurate composite of.

This woman might really have a case, but I don't truly believe in what I've read from the way the story was presented. I feel this way because of the continuous finger-pointing toward black men for crimes done in America.

Last fall, America watched and cried when Susan Smith announced that her children had been abducted.

The world sat and wondered what type of man could do something like this.

Susan Smith's reply was a BLACK MAN did it! She made up some vague description, and the entire town was looking for this black man.

Everybody now knows it was Susan Smith who committed this crime.

I can't tell you what this world is coming to when a woman can blatantly lie, blame and describe a fictional black man and the world believes her.

There are surely hundreds of more stories like these. I won't even discuss the O.J. Simpson trial.

I believe that I have a valid and true concern.

This is a concern that many black people have, and I hope that it is understood, especially by the media.

I do pray that the victim is fine and that true justice is served.

Bond epitomizes the ultimate guy

My wife, Patty, is the only female in our family of six humans and two dogs.

Actually there are TWO females if you include Sidney, our large, canine, eating-poop machine, but my wife does not appreciate my pointing out the fact that the only other female in the family is a Labrador retriever.

So, when it comes to making serious, absolutely critical, life-threatening family decisions, like what movie to watch on the VCR, my wife is desperately out-numbered (For reasons I have yet to fully understand, she will tell you the odds are even).

Patty prefers the romantic, totally boring type of movie that goes something like this: "Guy meets girl, girl falls in love with guy, guy runs like he is being chased by a GIANT LIZARD, guy is caught by giant lizard and rather than being eaten decides to marry girl, guy goes into serious debt to buy house for girl even though his progeny will still be paying for it long after the sun has cooled to a lifeless cinder roughly the size of a Malted Milk Ball, guy and girl have kids, guy and girl have more kids, girl finally figures out how to STOP having kids, guy goes without sex for VERY long time, guy and girl grow old, retire from work and go on expensive Caribbean cruise as second honeymoon (more debt), girl leaves guy on remote island to hunt for giant lizard, guy finds and kills giant lizard, guy and girl live happily ever after."

I prefer the more interesting adventure movies which never contain burdensome, thought-provoking dialogue or plot while simultaneously bombarding the sensitive, discriminating male viewer with lots of visual stimuli such as casual sex, bad guys, casual sex, violence, casual sex, numerous good-looking, big-boobed bimbos and lots of exploding stuff — not to mention casual sex.

This category of movie is epitomized by the all-time greatest casual sex, bad guys, casual sex-violence, casual sex, big-boobed bimbos, exploding stuff movie icon to ever hit the screen: James Bond.

I can remember as a kid watching Sean Connery, the best James Bond to ever serve Her Majesty's Secret Service, and wishing I could be like him. When I knew one of his movies was going to be showing, there was nothing else I could think about all week except going to the theater with "the guys" on Saturday night to see 007 in glorious, PanaVision action.

A nickel soda in one hand and a dime bag of popcorn in the other, and I was in James Bond heaven. It's a "guy thing" that my wife will never understand. In fact, she has on numerous occasions ruined some of James Bond's best scenes for the kids and me with her burdensome, thought-provoking, nit-picking questions. (All of us watching James Bond movie.)

Me: "Here's my FAVORITE part in this movie, guys!"

(A Bad Guy on a Bad Guy Motorcycle is chasing James Bond, who is driving his super-fast, super-secret, 007 Bondmobile. Bond flips a hidden lever in a hidden compartment in a hidden portion of the dash directly below a hidden, spare helicopter in his hidden suitcoat pocket which causes the Bad Guy's underwear to explode, sending a flaming-butted Bad Guy flying through the air. Bond then kisses the big-boobed bimbo sitting in the hidden passenger seat.)

Me: "HAW HAW! Did you see that? HAW HAW! That James Bond is REALLY something!"

(All males in the room fall down on the floor and slobber all over themselves with giggling, guy-like laughter.)

Patty: "How do you suppose James Bond made that guy's shorts explode?"

Me: "With a secret, 007, remote-control booby-trap, you silly girl!"

Patty: "And how did he GET that secret, 007, remote-control device IN the bad guy's underwear?"

Me (wiping slobber from my face): "Well ... he had to put it in the bad guy's under —"

All of us guys: "YUUUUUUUCCCCCKKKK!"

My wife-thinks James Bond is stupid and childish.

She thinks the way the women in James Bond movies act is just a bunch of sexist nonsense.

Well, all I have to say to that is, "NYAH, NYAH, NYAH!"

And as for my wife's silly, nit-picking, dumb, girl questions, let me just say for James Bond fans everywhere: "I really don't care how that remote-control booby-trap got in the Bad Guy's underwear."

"I don't even care if the Bad Guy was WEARING the underwear when 007 put the remote-control booby-trap in them, because I know James Bond would do it in a totally COOL way because HE IS JAMES BOND!"

I understand there is a new James Bond movie soon to be released.

Well, you can rest assured the boys and I will be there to see it.

I can't wait to sit down with a soda and a big bag of popcorn and watch all the casual sex, bad guys, casual sex, violence, casual sex, numerous good-looking, big-boobed bimbos, and lots of exploding stuff — not to mention the casual sex.

However, it is just not the same as when I was a kid.

Something tells me if I enjoy the big-boobed bimbos too much, I had better check my underwear.

Educating children reduces criminal tendencies

In the early morning hours of Oct. 12, the Topeka police unit known as the Street Crime Action Team was involved in a drug raid at a central Topeka apartment.

While trying to gain entrance to the apartment with a battering ram, police officer Tony Patterson received a fatal gunshot to the heart, ending his life in the line of duty.

Patterson became the fourth Topeka police officer to be killed in the line of duty, and, according to Attorney General Carla Stovall, became the 202nd law enforcement officer to give the ultimate sacrifice in the state of Kansas.

Truly, there can be no greater gift than to lay down your life for a friend, or in this case, for the people he has sworn to protect.

For this reason, I greatly respect law enforcement officers, for they know what they believe and why, and if necessary, are ready to die for what they believe and why.

However, there is more to the story than that.

Patterson was serving on an elite unit that was created specifically to battle crime on the streets, an area that has decayed as society has watched it crumble.

Fighting crime on the streets has nothing to do with race.

It has everything to do with bringing to justice those who commit crimes and find refuge in the anonymity of the street.

The man who allegedly shot Patterson is white, because like many other things, crime and the intent to commit it is color blind.

The expansion of crime in our country and especially in our cities is marked by a virtually indifferent attitude from within our society.

There is a greater tendency to move farther away from it, hire more police and hope it goes away than to actively oppose its spread.

The general response to try to prevent crime from spreading is to provide those that are "at-risk" with "education." For those who teach fundamental concepts, such as the three R's and the value of work, you receive far less credit than you deserve.

While this kind of knowledge may be too traditional or too much like Wally and the Beaver for some, I defy anyone to show me that the rate of crime has decreased since we started teaching children sex education on the basis that if they knew more about each other's sexual organs they would stop having sex, especially when coupled with passing out condoms.

The rise in unplanned pregnancies among unmarried women resulted in a rise in the number of children who grew up without fathers.

These children, without a father figure, turned to older male peers for guidance, who often failed to teach the difference between right and wrong.

As relativity spreads, it becomes harder and harder for people to agree that tough punishment should be administered for tough crimes.

Society at large often fails to implicitly teach that crime is wrong and sometimes coddles criminals.

This can be seen throughout all levels of our government, from state prisoners who receive more cable channels than I do to federal crime bills that rely on basketball and dancing lessons as forms of prevention.

Simply keeping a person busy will not change a heart and mind in regards to what one holds as right and wrong.

The time has come to stop leaning on the state to provide moral guidance for this country's children as provided by sex education class and for society to place this responsibility where it belongs — on the child's parents.

Until then, men like Tony Patterson will continue to place their lives on the line everyday as more and more people simply move try to move away from the problem.

Tony Patterson knew what he believed and why, and if necessary, he was ready to die for it.

The question is, do you?

Too many Psychic Friends infomercials

In news of the occult and paranormal, Pat Kubis and Mark Macy have written a book describing how those who have died have learned to communicate with the living via fax and e-mail. The book said heaven is on a planet in a galaxy called NGC4866, which apparently is on-line. If God's mercy is as great as his opponents say, when Rev. Fred Phelps finally kicks the bucket, the fax machines around here may keep on puking his garbage-laden rhetoric. On the other hand, Hell probably isn't too technologically advanced, and Phelps will just have to use the U.S. Postal Service.

Reach out and tank someone

In more telecommunications news, Donna Graybeal of Billerica, Mass., had a terrible time with her phone until recently. Her phone rang every 90 minutes for six months, but no one ever spoke when she picked up the phone. The phone calls were traced to a home in Potomac, Md., where an oil tank in the basement had a device installed that would call the oil company automatically when it became empty. Graybeal's phone number is the same as the old oil company's, and the family who owned the tank had quit using heating oil after it was emptied. In the wake of the flurry of calls, numerous telemarketing businesses are trying to hire the tank as a sales representative.

Watch out for the falling I.Q.s

Complaints about a T-shirt being sold at a Wal-Mart in Miramar, Fla., prompted the chain to discontinue sales on the grounds that the shirts' message was contrary to Wal-Mart's family values. The T-shirt read "Someday a woman will be president." While Wal-Mart has since began reselling the shirt, it is rumored the chain is also considering pulling other T-shirts with captions the corporation finds to be offensive and against family values. These shirts are rumored to say such things as "Racism is wrong," "Celebrating 75 years of women's suffrage," "Bill Clinton '96" and the peace symbol.

Must be those non-violent rock lyrics

Sarah Gore, the 16-year-old daughter of Vice President Al Gore and Tipper Gore, was recently cited by police for drinking beer in public. Details are sketchy, but Smatterings has reason to believe when police found Sarah she was listening to the Christian rap group D.C. Talk. I guess those parental advisory stickers don't work after all.

Don't blame Lorena Bobbit this time

New York police said it happened when he was drunk and trying to repair a guitar he was holding between his legs. Domingo Morales, 67, accidentally dismembered his member and put the clipping in a food container in his freezer. Morales was too embarrassed to admit he did it himself, so he told police a story that wouldn't embarrass him so much. He told them that a prostitute cut it off because he refused to pay her. Police were probably, uhm, tipped off that he hadn't visited a prostitute at all when the cut-off portion came back testing negative for venereal disease, but positive for a little freezer burn.

So what if the football game's in Lincoln? Why not # tailgate at home?

story by Stephanie Fuqua

You've got your big, foam finger and purple T-shirt on. Your face is painted, your hair is dyed, and you're ready for the big game against Nebraska. Unfortunately, the game is in Lincoln this year, but you can still watch the game on television and invite a few dozen of your closest friends over for a tailgate party in your living room.

Game time is at 2:30 p.m. on ABC, which is local cable channels 5 and 9.

The first thing you should do before the party is decide what to eat.

"We usually take some hamburgers and hotdogs," Brian Dowling, freshman undecided, said.

Cindy Davis, sophomore in business administration, pre-professional, said hamburgers and hot dogs are good tailgate fare.

"Hamburgers, hot dogs, bratwurst. And we always have potato chips and beverages. Coke and beer or bloody mary's. Sometimes we get Goodcents sub sandwiches," Davis said.

Steve Kirkland, manager of Mr. Goodcents, said the store sells two different party packs for tailgate parties.

The first party pack requires purchases of two or more at a cost of $3.99 each. The packs include any half-sandwich, your choice of chips, pasta or potato salad and a regular drink.

"Our party trays are 20 quarter subs, which ends up being close to 7 feet of sub, plus any sides you want, plates, cups, napkins, ice and utensils, plus two two-liter bottles of pop," Kirkland said. "The cost is $29.99."

If you decided to cook food at home, the Palace in Aggieville has football pasta and K-State taffy for dessert.

"The pasta is in football shapes, and we sell a mix that you can put spaghetti sauce on or make a pasta salad," Alison Melton, Palace employee, said.

If you're serving popcorn as a half-time snack, the Palace also has hollowed-out football helmets that popcorn or snacks can be served in.

Once you've decided what to eat, you need the proper tableware, colored purple, to serve your food on.

Mr. P's Party Outlet stocks a variety of purple balloons, napkins, silverware and tablecloths.

"They're all in purple," Barb Anderson, Mr. P's employee, said. "We even have purple confetti they can throw at each other."

If you feel like decorating the outside of your house, Mr. P's has mylar balloons with Willie and the Powercat on them.

Confetti's, a party store in Aggieville also stocks purple plates, napkins and cups, as well as two-foot balloons with wildcat logos on them. Stacey Williams, Confetti's employee, said.

If the T-shirt and foam finger aren't enough, you can always deck yourself out in a K-State football helmet. That is, a replica.

"The actual helmet is very, very expensive," Becky Ballard, owner of Ballard's Sporting Goods, said. "The ones we have look exactly alike, but they don't have the foam inside."

For half-time entertainment, Ballard's stocks mini footballs and basketballs.

Both Ballard's and Wildcat Spirit have glassware for all your beverage needs. Ballard's has mugs and shot glasses and Wildcat Spirit has mugs, tumblers, wine glasses and shot glasses.

"We also have K-State ice buckets, trash cans, water bottles, koozies and thermal cups," Molly Short, Wildcat Spirit employee, said.

Once lunch is out of the way, you need to plan snacks for later in the game.

Dillon's bakery has a wide assortment of snacks for the third-quarter munchies.

"We have cupcakes. We can make cakes with the powercat on them. We have purple and white cookies, small and large," Barbara Van Horn, Dillon's bakery employee, said.

For those without a sweet tooth, Dillon's also sells purple and white bread. The bakers take two pieces of bread, one of which is dyed purple, and braid or swirl them together to form a loaf that is purple and white.

PHILLIPS STILL WANTS HEISMAN

(AP) — Lawrence Phillips, the star Nebraska tailback suspended last month for attacking a former girlfriend, said Wednesday he made a mistake but still wants a shot at the Heisman Trophy with the No. 2 Cornhuskers.

Coach Tom Osborne said Phillips could return to practice next week after university officials decide on any disciplinary action. Phillips pleaded no contest and faces sentencing Dec. 1 on misdemeanor assault and trespassing charges.

FRIDAY

K-State's football team heads north to take on the No. 2 Nebraska Cornhuskers, while the volleyball team will play host to Missouri. Friday's Collegian will have complete previews.

Green, Farley to get their chance

Todd Walkenhorst
Daily Nebraskan

Ahman Green began the season listed fifth at his position on the Nebraska depth chart. Terrell Farley was fighting to play third at his spot.

But this week when Green, a true freshman running back, and Farley, a junior linebacker, checked the depth chart, they saw their names listed first for the first time in their college careers.

Backing up Ryan Terwilliger all season, Farley is third on the team with 25 tackles. The Columbus, Ga., native has recorded three sacks, good for second on the team behind outside linebacker Jared Tomich, who has four.

Farley has also intercepted two passes — both he returned for touchdowns — and has broken up two other passes.

Last week during the Cornhuskers' 57-0 rout of Missouri, Farley blocked a punt in the end zone for a safety.

"I just played and practiced hard, and they gave me a chance," Farley said after finding out he would start.

"My heart stopped. It just happened. I didn't expect it."

The result should translate into positive energy on the field against K-State Saturday, Farley said.

"I'm a little nervous," Farley said. "It's my first start, and it's against a Top 10 team. I'll get hyper for the game."

Other than that, Farley said little had changed in practice.

"It's all basically the same," he said. "Except now I practice before Ryan goes."

Green, whose climb up the depth chart has been accelerated by injuries to Damon Benning and Clinton Childs and the suspension of Lawrence Phillips, started against Missouri after earning the No. 1 spot late last week.

Benning and Childs have returned, yet Green remains on top. Saturday against the Cats, he will make his second career start.

The 6-foot 1-inch, 210 pounder ran for 90 yards on 16 carries last week against the Tigers. Starting against a Top 10 team with one of the best defenses in the nation would be a great experience, Green said.

"It's just something I had to do," Green said. "It feels good. It's another game and another challenge for me."

Green said playing a high-profile position for a top-notch program was overwhelming at first, but it was a challenge we wanted to conquer.

With 615 yards on 66 carries this season, the former high school all-American from Omaha, Neb., Central ranks second behind Calvin Jones who ran for 900 yards in 1991 — on Nebraska's all-time freshman running charts.

Green is averaging 9.3 yards per carry and has scored eight touchdowns in addition to earning a spot on the Huskers' No. 1 kickoff return unit.

"I picked up a lot of stuff in the first couple of weeks and first couple of games," Green said. "I picked it up, and I thought I was ready."

Green said he is looking forward to playing against one of the top defenses in the country.

"I dreamed about this much earlier than high school. All my family and friends will be watching."

Defense faces its greatest test Saturday in Lincoln

Todd Stewart
assistant sports editor

It wasn't as pretty last weekend in Stillwater, Okla., but after three consecutive shutouts, the K-State defense had nowhere to go but down.

A win is a win, and after Saturday's 23-17 victory over Oklahoma State, the Wildcats are still undefeated.

"We didn't play great," cornerback Joe Gordon said.

"But we played well enough to win."

K-State linebacker Percell Gaskins said it wasn't how prettily the team played, but the win that counts.

"We came away with the win, and we found a way to win," Gaskins said. "And that's the key."

It may not be good enough as the 6-0 Cats travel to Lincoln on Saturday to face the defending national champion and No. 2 ranked Nebraska Cornhuskers.

Gaskins said the key for the Cats for the rest of the Big 8 season will be stopping the opposing team's running backs.

"We're going to be facing some really great backs coming up," Gaskins said. "And we've got to get ready for that."

The Huskers are certainly no exception to that rule.

Even with Husker I-back Lawrence Phillips currently suspended from the team, the Nebraska running attack is still the strength of the team. True freshman running back Ahman Green continues to get the job done for the Huskers.

K-State defensive end Dirk Ochs said the team's goal has always been to keep the opposing offense off the field as much as possible.

"That's our goal. If we go three-and-out, that gets the offense out there and they put points on the board," Ochs said.

But just because the Cats failed in their attempt at a fourth-straight shutout, don't think they have given up on the thought of another shutout.

"If they don't score, we won't lose the game," Ochs said. "Because our offense will score points."

The win raised the Cats to 2-0 in the Big 8, and Cat defensive end Nyle Wiren said the beginning of conference play brings in new variables.

"We're in the Big 8 now, and you have to play with a lot more emotion," Wiren said.

Just as important, Wiren said, the Cats cannot allow the success so far in the season, and the Cats' highest-ever Associated Press ranking, go to their heads.

"We're working hard, and we need to get better each week," Wiren said.

"And that's the key."

MAJOR LEAGUE BASEBALL

Experience to help Braves in upcoming World Series

■ Atlanta has been there, and that will be the difference

Associated Press

ATLANTA — The Atlanta Braves have one distinct advantage over the Cleveland Indians heading into the World Series — experience.

Ten Braves have combined for 71 games of World Series action, most in the losses to Minnesota in 1991 and Toronto in 1992.

Six players on the Indians' roster have been in 28 World Series games, all with other teams.

The most successful Braves in the Series have been second baseman Mark Lemke, who was in line to be the Series' Most Valuable Player had the Braves beaten the Twins in '91, and pitcher John Smoltz, who has a 1-0 record in four starts with a 1.95 ERA in 27 2-3 innings.

Lemke has appeared in 12 Series games with a .326 average and six RBIs.

He hit .417 against the Twins, driving in four runs. He had three triples in four at bats over a two-game span.

The Indians' top Series performers are pitcher Orel Hershisier, who has a 7-0 postseason record including the playoffs, and reserve catcher Tony Pena, who hit .409 and drove in four runs for the St. Louis Cardinals in the 1987 Series against Minnesota.

Hershisier, pitching for the Los Angeles Dodgers, had a 2-0 record and 1.00 ERA in two complete games against Oakland in 1988.

David Justice of the Braves and Eddie Murray of the Indians said they hope to improve on disappointing Series numbers.

Justice's 13 games are the most by any player on either team. He has a .217 batting average with three homers and nine RBIs, driving in five of those in 1991's fifth game against the Twins.

Murray, the Indians' designated hitter, appeared in 12 games for Baltimore against Pittsburgh in 1979 and Philadelphia in 1983. He has a .196 Series average with three homers and five RBIs.

Besides Smoltz, five other Atlanta pitchers have played in the Series. Steve Avery has an 0-1 record in four games, Tom Glavine a 2-2 mark in four, Kent Mercker one scoreless inning of relief in two games, Mark Wohlers 2 1/3 scoreless innings of relief in five games and Alejandro Pena a 1-1 record and 1.74 ERA in five games in relief. Pena's Series victory came when he beat Oakland for the Dodgers in 1988.

Shortstop Jeff Blauser and utility infielder Rafael Belliard have each appeared in 11 Series games for Atlanta, Blauser hitting .233 and Belliard .375, going 6-for-11 with four RBIs against the Twins. Belliard was a defensive replacement in four games against the Blue Jays in '92, never going to the plate.

Other Indians who have appeared in the Series are first baseman Paul Sorrento (0-for-2 in three games for the Twins against the Braves in '91), pitcher Dennis Martinez (18.00 ERA in four innings of two games for Baltimore against Pittsburgh in 1979) and reliever Eric Plunk (1 2-3 scoreless innings in two games for Oakland against Los Angeles in 1988).

► HARKER TO RECEIVE FULL SCHOLARSHIP

K-State President Jon Wefald announced Tuesday that former Wildcat baseball player Brad Harker, junior in mass communications, will be receiving an academic scholarship from the University.

Harker will receive the scholarship through the remainder of his undergraduate career.

Harker played first base for the Cats. He was assaulted on the night of July 16 while playing for the Columbus Americans, a summer collegiate baseball team in Ohio.

The incident is still being investigated by Columbus police.

Harker was released from the Ohio State University Medical Center last week and returned to his home in Lawrence.

He is expected to return to classes at K-State in spring 1996 as a part-time student. Whether he will be able to return to the baseball team is still under consideration.

Wefald said K-State is much like a family and as such is committed to assisting students when needed.

"We will not let a vicious and cowardly attack upon one of our students destroy that individual's opportunity for an education," Wefald said. "When members of this campus, be they students, faculty or staff, are put in a life-threatening situation like this young man experienced, K-State will always honor its commitment to them."

► VOLLEYBALL

Cats defeat Wichita State in 4 games

Shana Newell
staff writer

After a slow start, the K-State volleyball team was able to shock Wichita State University for the second time this season last night at Little Arena, improving its overall record to 15-5.

The last time the two teams met, the Wildcats defeated their intrastate rivals easily in three matches, going 15-6, 15-12 and 15-6.

Wichita State proved a somewhat tougher opponent for the Cats the second time around, however. The Shockers were able to keep the first game close, forcing the K-State squad to play into extra points. The Cats emerged the victors as they won the first game 16-14, out-hitting the Shockers 267 to 150.

The second game was far easier for the Cats. The Wichita State netters dropped their second game of the match, 15-5. Again, the Cats hit better than their opponents, hitting .292 compared to a Wichita State .061.

In the third game, the Shockers bounced back to overcome the Cats 12-15. The tables were turned as the Cats managed to hit a mere .056.

Wichita State hit solidly at .343.

But the Cats were not out for very long.

The match-winning fourth game came for the Cats after another poor performance by Wichita State. The Cats improved their hitting from the third game to .300 while the Shockers once again fell to a measly .040.

For the match, the Cats out-hit the Shockers .220 to .158.

Leading the Cat squad were junior middle blocker Kate DeClerk, sophomore setter Devon Rynning and fresh-

DeClerk had 16 digs for the team, five block assists and 13 kills.

Rynning accumulated 44 set assists. She also had nine digs on the night, second only to DeClerk, and a team-high seven block assists.

Zschau had five service aces against the Shockers while also contributing defensively with eight digs.

K-State coach Jim Moore was unavailable for comment.

The Cats next are host to the Missouri Tigers at 7:30 p.m. Saturday at Ahearn Field House.

- James A. Strain, professor of percussion, will present nine actor-percussionist songs utilizing various household items, such as glass jars, a frying pan, chop sticks, broken glass and steak knives. The program will begin at 8 tonight in All Faiths Chapel. Admission is free.
- Rock bands Fragile Porcelain Mice and Gilligan will play at 10:30 tonight at Club Berlin.
- KMKF-101.5 FM, (better known as K-Rock), will celebrate its fifth anniversary at 9:30 tonight with a concert at Bombers upstairs. The show will feature Vancouver, Canada artists Catfish. Tickets are $5.

Weird stuff II: More sites to see

Darin Siefkes
contributing writer

This week we look into the weird and the wacky on the net, part two, due to popular request. And if you don't have Netscape by now, you're missing out. Get it free at (<http://www.netscape.com>).

Bald is Beautiful

(<http://pubweb.acns.nyu.edu/~pfa/bald.html>)

Bald men of the world unite! The page is dedicated to every man who is missing a little from the top, created by the women who love them.

The authors have included music performed by the hairless, other bald homepages and bald humor.

A list of bald animals and places make this one an interesting page. The graphics may not be the best on this page, but it downloads quickly and is fun to read.

Jorge Donato's Computer Graphics Project

(<http://vision.cc.tulane.edu/donato/jorge.html>)

This home page has some of the coolest animation on the net. "Paper Airplane vs. the Tornado," for example, simply must be seen to be appreciated.

Jorge has also included weather information from the National Weather Service, including a graphical radar summary for the Central United States.

A warning: This page is very slow.

MTV

(<http://www.mtv.com/>)

MTV has sold itself as the edge of entertainment, and its page is no exception. It is very well done with great graphics and fun themes.

The MTV animation pages include pages for Beavis & Butt-head, the Maxx, and the Head. Its Maxx section is particularly exceptional, with sounds, videos and even pictures of the original comic book covers.

The MTV News section includes "The Week in Rock" for all the music-news junkies. The week in rock intro is also available for download.

The music section lists the current buzz clips, as well as what is happening on most of MTV's shows.

And the "Real World" section not only includes pictures and biographies of all the cast members, but it also has a show summary in case a viewer missed one week.

Ask Dr. Internet

(<http://promo.net/gut/index.cgi>)

The popular Internet magazine created its own homepage. This is a stop all net junkies must try.

Anything and everything anyone would want to know about the net are included in articles, which are set up in an easy-to-read format.

If the question you need to know isn't included, e-mail Dr. Internet; he is always glad to help.

Polygram Entertainment

(<http://www.polygram.com/polygram/PolyGram.html>)

The makers of the movie "Dazed and Confused" have created a homepage that everyone will be "taking" about.

In its music section, bands under the PolyGram label are featured with biographies and tour dates. A discography is also included for each band to make this a good music resource.

On the "New Releases" section, pictures and sound bytes are available for the taking.

A PURPLE AFFAIR

Callers question Phelps

Sarah Lunday
campus editor

K-State can expect a visit from Fred Phelps next week.

As the guest of last night's "A Purple Affair," Fred Phelps had a chance to speak his mind and answer callers' questions on the subjects of homosexuality, the Bible and Janet Reno.

"She's a 24-carat lesbian, you know," Phelps said to Purple Affair co-host Jason Dechant, junior in political science and speech, before the show began.

Phelps, who turns 66 next month, said Reno is a lesbian, and he has eight affidavits to present to her Tuesday night if she accepts the Landon Lecture invitation.

Members of the Phelps clan and himself often picket events they view as homosexual or accepting homosexuality, he said.

Their signs include terms like, "God hates fags," "AIDS cures fags" and "Dole is a fag."

"Anybody that knows anything about the Bible knows that more is said about the hate and wrath of God," Phelps said.

As a preacher, he is just trying to do his job, Phelps said.

"I'm not trying to change them, I'm just trying to preach the truth of God," he said.

Homosexuals and people who favor the homosexual lifestyle are killing this country, Phelps said. Their power is prominent in Topeka, at K-State and on the campus newspaper, the Collegian, he said.

"This fool Kevyn Jacobs is writing that dribble, bragging about his homosexual conduct," Phelps said.

Homosexual conduct is illegal in Kansas, and the prosecutors in Manhattan should arrest Jacobs on the basis of his column, he said.

Phelps said he received a letter from four K-State faculty members and seven students thanking him in his efforts against homosexuality.

"Every week, we have been forced to see Kevyn Jacobs rejoice," Phelps quoted from the letter.

Frank, a caller to the show, said Phelps seemed very insecure about his own sexuality and asked if the reverend was a homosexual.

"That is an impertinent, insulting question, and it often derives from homosexuals," Phelps said. Co-host Aaron Decker, senior in radio and television, asked Frank to get off the phone.

Decker said the phone lines were filled with callers, and he said he did not want "A Purple Affair" to be another "Ricki Lake" show.

A caller, who identified herself as Amy, asked Phelps why he picketed her friend's funeral in Topeka.

"I wanted to know if you have any respect for the dead whatsoever," she said.

Funerals are often a place where people give a message, Phelps said. The funeral picketed must have been that of a somewhat famous homosexual, he said. The media must have turned him into a hero for his belief in homosexuality, Phelps said.

"If that close friend of yours were to come back, they would stand with Fred Phelps in the picket line and warn others," Phelps said.

Amy said her friend would spit on the sidewalk Phelps stood on.

"He was an angel," she said.

The questions throughout the show were sensible questions, Phelps said.

"You had a couple of guys who were on my side," he said.

Greeks study God, discuss relationships

Sarah Kallenbach
staff reporter

Each Tuesday night, small groups of greek students gather to share, offer encouragement and study God.

"It is beneficial not only to study the Bible but also to gain encouragement from other Christians to live my life openly and honestly for Christ," said Kristy Jantz, senior in dance and early childhood development and member of Sigma Kappa.

The Cat Connection met a 10 every Tuesday night at for eight weeks to discuss problems that faced college students.

Now, the group has broken into smaller groups. The small groups consist of 10 to 15 students, and eight to 10 groups that meet at various sorority and fraternity houses at 10 every Tuesday night.

"We have discussed relationships, how to deal with stress and life after death," Zachary Trumpp, sophomore in finance and member of Alpha Gamma Rho, said. "Things that are relevant to us as Christians in college."

Discussing relationships is always a favorite topic during the study, because students can identify.

"It is interesting to do lessons on relationships, especially with a co-ed greek," Jantz said. "It is something we are so in touch with."

The lesson about relationships also offered an opportunity to hear the other side of the story.

"We got to hear the guys' side to see where they are coming from," Debbie Rust, junior in early childhood development and member of the Alpha Delta Pi, said.

The groups also talked about stress management and how to deal as a college student.

Each week the lessons were led by a different male and female from within the greek system.

"Usually they are the people who are the most mature in their faith with God," Rust said.

Students volunteer to lead the study each week.

Leading the group was made easier for Jantz, because of her role as president at the Sigma Kappa sorority.

"For me, I was really comfortable leading, and I tried to make the group really comfortable and to make it flow," she said.

Making the group comfortable was a main objective of the group as Cat Connection came to a close and smaller groups were formed.

"Not everyone is comfortable in a large group," Jantz said.

"Since they are more comfortable in a smaller group, they feel free to learn more and share more," she said.

The smaller groups will give students an opportunity to relate to each other and discuss the topics they want.

"It is also easier to bounce ideas off each other and to get to the real meat of the topic," Trumpp said.

Rust said the groups are important because they help to unify the greek community.

"The purpose is to bring greeks from fraternities and sororities from every house to hear God's word and discuss the issues and what the Bible says about them," Rust said.

Moses draw a train?"

"Granted, a lot of people would argue that she may not have drawn it like I did, but that's because she didn't have to build it."

Not only must the designs be simple enough to change from one scene to the next quickly, but they must also be cheap.

"Our budgets are dreadfully small," he said. "We have $4,200 for Music Man. That's a sneeze. It must pay for every drop of paint, plywood, glue, screws and nails."

But LaVern Tiemeyer, scene shop foreman, was up for the challenge.

"If he can design it, I can build it," Tiemeyer said.

The blueprints are brought to life in the loading dock garage in the back of McCain.

The shop was a monument to all the past shows. A chandelier was hung from a rusty pipe and a black, naked male statue carelessly dangled from another.

Wood was piled 6 feet high and red, neatly labeled drawers lined the gray cement floor. A poster with a dog rolling over and laughing said, "You want the set by when?"

Likewise, sounds of laughter echoed through the garage as Travis Malone, the actor who plays the Music Man, stood on a platform in front of a spotlight and a volunteer traced his shadow with charcoal.

The backdrop being constructed will be used when the Music Man delivers a speech, and it will perfectly replicate the silhouette of the Music Man as he stands on the podium.

Malone tried to stand still with his right hand on his hip and his left hand in the air with his index finger pointing up, as if he was making a crucial point.

The seven other student workers, watch, laugh and scrutinize the pose.

"I don't think the single finger in the air looks good," Todd Bullock, master carpenter and senior in architectural construction science, said mockingly.

But the silhouette flat is just one of 50 the designers have to make. They also have to build the hills and houses.

The hills and houses will be made in a similarly simple way. The designers cover a wooden frame with a beige cloth called muslin.

The frame is starched with a mixture of glue and water, which, when it dries, shrinks the fabric so it fits tightly on the frame. The houses or hills are then painted.

When the house flats are finished, they will weigh less than 30 pounds, yet they will look like authentic wooden houses.

Tiemeyer said they were made this way so they were cheap and could be quickly moved from one scene to the next.

And although stress is increasing as the deadlines near, Tiemeyer said he is trying to keep things lighthearted.

"I just try to find the humorous side to things and go on," he said. "Sometimes we even have fun in here."

MALL

the city. The city owns the land the mall is on, as well as the parking lot. The city agreed to pay the mall's rent in a 1992 land lease agreement because the mall was having a cash-flow problem.

In 1992, Forest City went before the city commission and asked the city to pay the mall's rent for the next 10 years. Forest City was in a tight position when Chase Manhattan Bank, the previous bond holder, threatened to exercise the put option on Forest City.

"Unless Forest City substantially improved its cash flow, Chase Manhattan Bank threatened that it would force tenants to buy the bonds back," Wood said.

That's when Forest City asked the city to forego its rent payments so it could increase its cash flow. The 1992 commission agreed to pay the rent for five years.

At the Tuesday night commission meeting, James Richardson, Forest City project developer, tried to convince the commission its partnership with the city is paying off.

"The mall is more stable than it ever has been," Richardson said, adding that the mall has increased city sales-tax revenue and is at 85 percent occupancy.

"This will enhance the mall's strength in the future," he said.

Bob Buel, a member of the audience, said a mall foreclosure is not likely and is a scare tactic that was used on the 1992 commission to profit the owners of the mall at the expense of Manhattan taxpayers.

He warned the current commission not to succumb to the tactic and represent the taxpayers.

"Don't get hung up on the little details," Buel said to the commission.

"We are not partners in this deal. We're a landlord, now, that's not getting any rent."

Buel said if the city keeps paying the mall's rent, it will cost Manhattan $1.85 million.

"That's ball fields we can't build, streets we can't fix, services we can't provide. That money is gone," Buel said. "We should undo the horrible mistake that the 1992 commission made."

Steve Hall, city commissioner, proposed Forest City pay back rent for the last four years. The commission did not follow the suggestion.

Wood said although it might seem odd the city is paying the mall's rent, it is not an unusual practice. The city helps other businesses in Manhattan, such as Campbell's, Artex Man-ufacturing Co. Inc. and Hill and Co. Inc., he said.

"We issue general obligation bonds in new subdivisions so developers can get tax-exempt interest rates," Wood said. "We're always working with private industry, using public money to enhance the local economy."

AEROBICS

great training and monthly workshops so the Rec counted that as certification," Bishop said.

Carol Morrisette, senior in architecture and aerobics instructor for the Ladies Club and L.I.E.E., said she recommends getting certified.

"Legally, you don't have to be certified, but it would be hard to find a job without being certified," Morrisette said.

It costs $149 to take the A.C.E. test, which is given in major cities across the United States, she said.

For those students interested in becoming an instructor, Morrisette said she suggested going to as many different classes with as many different teachers as possible. That allows students to experience a variety of teaching styles and exercise combinations, she said.

She also recommended getting an audio tape to learn how to count with the eight count and to practice cues.

"Find someone to tell you the basics. Then practice with a friend until you can get them to do the steps without showing the steps to them," Morrisette said.

One drawback experienced by many instructors is burnout.

Bishop said she teaches five classes a week, and because they are at high risk for burn-out, instructors shouldn't overload themselves with many classes.

"So many people depend on you every week to give them a good workout and to make it fun. It's easy for me to get burned out when my schedule is crammed and when I haven't had time to learn new steps," Bishop said.

Beginning instructors usually earn $5 to $6 per class in Manhattan. In Wichita instructors earn about $12 per class. In big cities such as Chicago or Kansas City, the larger clubs pay instructors about $30 per class, Bishop said.

Although money isn't everything, one downfall of the job is the amount of outside preparation time that you don't get paid for, both Bishop and Morrisette said. Bishop said she spends about five hours outside class preparing combinations for the routines.

"I like to use eight combinations in one class and do add-on choreography, which is means you keep building the combinations until the routine is complete," she said.

"It makes the participants feel good when they get the steps and routine. It increases their self-confidence," Bishop said.

Council changes rules for tickets

Kimberly Hefling
staff reporter

Bicycle registration enforcement will begin Nov. 1, but there's a catch.

Parking Council decided Thursday to ticket bicyclists for not having a registered bicycle only if they are breaking another bicycle regulation, such as locking a bike to a handicap railing.

A ticket for not being registered is $5.

The ticket for not having a registered bicycle will then be waived if the bicyclists opt to register their bicycles with the University.

"Basically, this will give the appearance of a strict deadline but show that we're not so gung-ho that we want to go out and ticket every bicycle," Phil Mudd, council member, said. "This is a balance between showing we believe this is a serious thing but at the same time, not enforcing the regulation with a hammer on it."

The council did not set a deadline for full enforcement of the bicycle registration policy.

Of the 1,400 to 1,700 estimated bicyclists on campus, John Lambert, director of public safety, said 740 bicycles have been registered with the University.

Ronnie Grice, director of the K-State Police, said bicycle registration is a worthwhile cause and will be instrumental in helping to return stolen or lost bikes.

Last year, Grice said campus police had 55 to 60 bicycles that were either found, abandoned or turned in that they were unable to return to owners. The unclaimed bikes were auctioned.

"Why would someone not want to register something so valuable?" Grice said. "In case it's found, it can be returned."

Senate supports free bicycle registration

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

Student Senate passed a resolution in support of free bicycle registration Thursday night.

Bicycle registration is now free, but Senate said it wanted registration to stay free.

Russell Fortmeyer, Parking and Campus Safety Committee chairman, said his committee took an informal poll at the recent bike fair and students said they did not want to pay for bike registration.

Once the reasons for registration were explained, most students said they supported registration, he said.

Brenda Halinski, graduate senator, proposed the amendment that encouraged keeping the registration free.

"In the past, when we don't address these issues going in, we end up saying hindsight is 20/20," she said.

The registration would give future senators a way to fight a registration fee, she said.

The amended resolution passed.

A resolution supporting tuition accountability also passed. Tuition accountability would allow K-State to keep 25 percent of any tuition increase beginning in fall 1996.

In other business, eight student organizations were allocated funds.

Environmental professionals received $1,413.80 for a speaker and a career development workshop.

The Students for Disability Awareness received an allocation for $95.50 for a newsletter and a subscription to a publication for disabled people.

The Native American Student Body was allocated funds for its annual Pow Wow and a speaker.

Chris Avila, Allocations Committee chairman, proposed an Southwestern Bell Telephone workers from Topeka examine a fiber-optic splice block outside of Denison late Thursday night after much of the campus computer network on south end of campus was rendered useless.

A cut fiber-optic cable leaves half of campus

Off-line

Claudette Riley
staff writer

A cable cut at 3:49 p.m. Thursday left the southern half of campus without access to networked computer systems.

Spencer Smith, network administrator for Telecommunications, began investigating the loss of connection immediately.

"We don't know who did it or why it was done," Smith said. "There is evidence of work in the steam utility tunnel, so whoever was working down there yesterday will get a call at 8 in the morning."

A fiber-optic cable was severed and Anderson, Kedzie, Fairchild, Nichols, McCain, Calvin and Thompson halls lost their connections with the rest of the campus, Smith said.

Tim Ramsey, UNIX System Administrator for Computing and Network Services, helped determine the location of the problem.

"Once we eliminated the network as a problem, we called Telecom and told them that we suspected a problem with the cable," Ramsey said. "They sent a repair (technician) out and they found the loss of connection."

unications was contacted and was on site by 7 p.m., Smith said.

The cut was deliberate, because the 48 strands of fiber were encased in PVC and strands of piano wire which require bolt cutters or specialized tools to sever, Ramsey said.

"It will be interesting to see who did this, whoever was responsible," Smith said. "If it was a contractor, they will eventually end up paying for the repairs. If it was someone from K-State facilities

TDM may extend plant

Brent Johnson

Troy Design and Manufacturing Co. might expand its alternative-fuel vehicle plant in Manhattan.

Manhattan could be the future sight of a TDM conversion plant for natural-gas powered vehicles, Randy Martin, president of the Manhattan chamber of commerce, said.

"After we were successful with bringing the electric-vehicle plant here, we approached TDM to locate their natural-gas conversion plant here also," said James Hague, associate professor of architectural engineering and construction.

If TDM finds a natural-gas vehicle conversion plant in Manhattan, the facility will generate more jobs in conjunction with the electric-vehicle plant.

The expansion of a new facility will generate an additional 60 or more jobs during the next few years. Pay for these positions will average $30,000 to $40,000 a year, Martin said.

To bring the natural-gas conversion plant to Manhattan, the chamber of commerce will develop an incentive program for TDM to be presented to the Manhattan city commission,

African dance planned

Tonya Bobbitt
staff reporter

Students can dance their way into African Nite '95 at 9:30 p.m. Saturday in Union Station.

The African Student Union is sponsoring its first dance of the semester, said Sydney Lisk-Anani, graduate student in regional and community planning and president of the African Student Union.

"We want to have this dance so that people can learn about our culture through music," Lisk-Anani said, "because many Americans think that African music is only about drumming."

Nyambe Harleston, senior in monetary policy and banking and treasurer of the International Coordinating Council for international organizations, said ICC helps sponsor activities for international students because the group tries to inform people about the different cultures on campus and the community.

"We think that this is a good way to show not only K-State, but the Manhattan community, that there are different kinds of rich cultures that exist in Manhattan," Harleston said.

She also said few Americans know what is going on in other cultures.

"Many Americans don't know what's happening outside of the United States," Harleston said. "This is our way of bringing other cultures to them."

The dance is free, and everyone is invited, not just Africans.

Lisk-Anani also said he wants people to know that ASU is for

SAFE ZONE

Pink triangles to denote free homosexual speech

Nicole Kirby
staff reporter

Inverted pink triangles sporting a smiling purple Willie will soon be hanging on some faculty doors across campus.

The Bisexual and Gay and Lesbian Society has organized project Safe Zone, which includes hanging the small sign on faculty doors to tell students where they can talk freely about homosexual topics.

"This is to give students a sense that they can go talk to someone about any problem in general," Shel Barry, fifth-year student in architecture and BGLS co-president, said.

"We have made up bookmarks that have the safe zone logo, and we're sending them out to all the departments on campus," Heather Nelson, junior in psychology and BGLS co-president, said. "We're going to ask them to tape them to their door or somewhere visible in their office."

The bookmarks will also have a logo with Willie the Wildcat superimposed over an inverted pink triangle.

Students can expect faculty members who post the sign to be understanding, supportive and trustworthy if a gay, lesbian or bisexual student or colleagues who need help, advice or just someone to talk to, according to the bookmark.

People displaying the message will also avoid heterosexist assumptions, confront homophobia and use inclusive language.

Finally, a person displaying the symbol should believe K-State is enriched by the diversity of gay, lesbian and bisexual people, according to the bookmark.

Students have expressed an interest in having a service like this one. Barry said people have come up to him to ask questions because of his involvement in BGLS.

"Most of them don't want to talk to Lafene Health Center because they tape-record every session," Barry said.

"Students are having a hard enough time that they're dealing with that. They don't want anyone to have proof of it."

Susan Scott, associate dean of student life, has helped the group make the project a reality.

The bookmarks were sent to Scott's office, and she said she plans to add to the group's distribution

ATTORNEY GENERAL RENO TO DELIVER LONDON LECTURE TUESDAY

U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno is scheduled to deliver a Landon Lecture at 7 p.m. Tuesday in Bramlage Coliseum.

The public affairs division of the Department of Justice said although Reno is scheduled to deliver the lecture, they could not confirm until the day before the event.

"A Lawrence TV station called the Justice Department, and they confirmed," Charles Reagan, chairman of the Landon Lecture committee, said.

The Topeka and Manhattan-area media have confirmed the engagement, and Reagan said he had been contacted by Reno's assistants, but the public affairs department was unwilling to confirm.

Instead, the office said Reno is scheduled to visit K-State and has every intention of doing so.

Reagan spoke to Reno's speech writers to make arrangements about the details of the event, but he does not know what she is planning to speak about.

Fred Phelps said he was planning to visit K-State during Reno's lecture. Phelps and members of his Westboro Baptist Church are known for their picket lines.

The protectors picket at events that promotes homosexuality or the homosexual lifestyle, Phelps said.

Reno is a target because Phelps said he believes she is a lesbian.

BLOOD DRIVE COMES TO K-STATE

The annual University of Kansas and K-State blood drive begins at 2 p.m. Monday in the Derby Dining Center.

"K-State's going to get the trophy back," said Nancy Powell, American Red Cross consultant for the K-State Blood Drive.

K-State consistently won the blood drive every year, until last year, Powell said.

The drive is a week-long event, and the winning school is announced at the K-State vs. KU game Saturday.

Blood can be given from 2 to 7 p.m. at the Derby Dining Center Monday and from 9:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Tuesday through Friday at the K-State Student Union.

STUDENTS REPORT ASSAULT

Two Smurthwaite House students reported an assault that occurred Sunday night at a birthday party.

The two students reported Tuesday to Riley County Police that a group celebrating a Smurthwaite member's 19th birthday stopped by the Smith Scholarship House on the way home. Police said a member of Smith grew angry and pointed what looked like a gun at one Smurthwaite woman's head, then turned and shot off the cap of the student celebrating her birthday.

The man was restrained by other members of the house. Police said the gun was a B.B. or pellet gun, but because it could cause injury, the man could be charged with aggravated assault.

Police said a separate instance of battery is also under investigation.

YOUTH KILLED IN CAR ACCIDENT

A 15-year-old Junction City youth died at 6:45 Wednesday night in a two-car collision on Fort Riley Boulevard.

Tiffany Canaday was a passenger in a Plymouth Horizon that was hit when it turned left from Fort Riley Boulevard onto Westwood Road. 18-year-old Roni Carvalho, Ogden, was driving the Honda Accord that struck the right rear of the Horizon, where Canaday was seated.

Canaday was thrown through the Horizon's hatchback window and pronounced dead at the scene.

The Horizon driver, 16-year-old Laura Sterling, Junction City, was taken to the Saint Mary Hospital for head and rib injuries. Carvalho was also taken to Saint Mary for head and leg injuries.

There were three other passengers in the Horizon, all of whom were taken to Saint Mary. Fifteen-year-old Mark Oliveras, 2038 College Heights Road, and 18-year-old Brian Oliveras, Junction City, were also ejected from the vehicle. Fourteen-year-old Kevin Oliveras, 2038 College Heights Road, was not ejected from the vehicle but went to Saint Mary for observation.

Conditions of the patients are not available.

Police said they believe alcohol may have been a factor in the accident. No charges have been filed at this time.

An investigation will not conclude until blood-alcohol tests submitted to the Kansas Bureau of Investigation in Topeka are returned. Results may not return for two to three weeks.

Funeral arrangements have not yet been announced for Canaday.

Kyler Erickson stares intently at a vinegar rocket ready to go off at any moment Wednesday afternoon at the Seven Dolors TASK program. The Seven Dolors Child Care Center received $7,000 from the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services to buy equipment and supplies.

teach responsibility

Becky Sheridan
staff reporter

Children in the Seven Dolors' After School Kids program don't spend all their after-school time watching television. Instead, they write, learn about science or grow plants.

Christi Oakley, director of the child care center, said the center just had board games for the children before receiving a $7,000 grant from Social and Rehabilitation Services. Most of the money has been used for equipment and supplies.

The center's after-school program, called TASK, caters to the needs of working parents and offers activities that are key to the development of children.

"I applied for the grant because we didn't have many resources for the kids," Oakley said. "We were starting to have behavior problems because there just wasn't anything for them to do."

The center now has big-screen microscopes, magnifying glasses and plant-growing kits, as well as shelving and individual tables for the different stations, Oakley said.

"We have different stations so that the kids can explore what's important to them," Tracy Bartel, lead teacher and on-site director of TASK, said. "If they like science, they can go to the science center, or if they are interested in language skill, they can listen to tapes or write in their journals."

Bartel said one of the main goals of the program is to foster self esteem.

"We do this by giving the children responsibilities, which, in turn, gives them confidence, not only in here, but outside of the center," Bartel said.

Bartel said one of the responsibilities given to the children was picking a pet. The children voted on a pet and were responsible for making questions about that pet to ask local pet stores.

"This way, the responsibility was taken away from the teacher and given to the children," Bartel said. "This allows them to find out information on their own, develop rules and prepare for responsibility."

Brenda Heptig, parent and K-State employee, said she agrees the program teaches the children to be responsible.

"I can see it when I go there to get my kids because they're all picking up their toys," she said. "There's also a lot of interaction between the workers and the kids, which is good."

Oakley said workers from the program pick the children up at school and that benefits the parents.

"I can't take off work in the middle of the day, so it really helps

Safe Zone program provides necessary outlet

All groups deserve to be heard and have their rights respected.

Gays, bisexuals and lesbians now have a safe haven on campus to receive support.

The Bisexual and Gay and Lesbian Society has organized "Safe Zone," a project to alert students to a place where they can talk freely about homosexual topics.

The program allows participants to identify themselves, either faculty or students, by displaying on tag on their doors with a Willie Wildcat insignia superimposed over an inverted pink triangle.

This tag describes the participants as being understanding and supportive of a gay, lesbian or bisexual person and asserts that the individual is not homophobic or heterosexual.

Safe Zone gives bi/les/gays a much-needed sympathetic ear to bend on problems they are having with being bi/les/gay on the K-State campus.

This program is an outreach to a campus demographic that formerly didn't know whom it could trust.

It gives people a public support network.

It is, however, a shame that we must single out a specific group for special consideration.

All groups deserve to be heard and have their rights respected.

While we are not condoning or condemning the lifestyles of the people in the bi/les/gay community, we support this program because it allows people to know who they can talk to.

Homosexuals have the highest suicide rate of any demographic, a statistic often contributed to the fact that homosexuals don't have anyone to talk to about problems.

One cannot tell who might be sympathetic to this community just by looking.

Belief, spirit drives Wildcats to victory

This column is long overdue. I've been waiting for years to see a column resembling it, and because none had been written until now, here it is.

Aren't you tired of hearing "The Wildcats might have a chance this year?" "They'll be in it in the first half, but Nebraska always pulls away in the second half," or my personal least-favorite, "Well, I HOPE we win."

I say to hell with comments like these and all similar ones.

Let's differentiate between hope and belief. When you just hope, you don't really expect it to happen, so you don't put in a full effort of support for what you want.

When you believe, you put in every last ounce of energy you can possibly spare to help your team to victory.

K-State will win Saturday, period. I believe they will win.

Why? A simple seven-letter word called destiny that indicates it is K-State's turn to take home a victory from Lincoln.

How very appropriate it is that K-State will defeat Nebraska Saturday in the next step to winning the final Big 8 season title race.

K-State will win tomorrow because I, and thousands like me, believe they will win. Sports is 90-percent mental, as most good coaches will tell you. A team's fans add to or detract from the mental toughness of a team, because the team can sense if the fans believe it will win. It is our duty as fans not to give any sense of doubt at any time.

In the 1989 season, a few believing fans saw the beginning of the biggest turnaround in college football history. When K-State earned the win at the close of the North Texas game, many fans had already left, missing the milestone victory that removed the winless-streak monkey from the Wildcat's back.

Those fans who remained got true satisfaction knowing they stayed with something they believed in until the end. Likewise, you have a chance to feel a similar satisfaction. Let's not make the team do it alone as it did in that North Texas game. Let's give it the mental edge from beginning to end with our belief it will win.

Will you fail to correct those who say, "We'll never beat Nebraska," or "They're going to kill us?" A true fan doesn't even mention the possible occurrence of a loss.

If one does, it is simply a piece of support for the opponent, in this case, the Nebraska Cornhuskers. I challenge everyone who has read this far to promise yourself something; when you watch the game, believe we will win. Don't just hope it, believe it.

JEFF SUDBECK
junior in business

As the clock ticks off the final seconds in the fourth quarter and you see we have won the game, 7-0, you will realize what you've done.

Whether at the game or watching from home, you'll realize that you believed in something and it came true.

The K-State players already believe they will win and should expect nothing less from the fans than your belief that they will win also.

If you must, cut this article out and use it as a weapon against all doubters, keep it with you during the game just as a reminder to believe in the victory to come. The feeling you'll get will be the most satisfying there is because you helped your team win. K-State will win 7-0.

Why? Because seven seems to be a very important number this season to K-State. This is the seventh game of the season. The win will put us at 7-0. This is Bill Snyder's seventh season as coach of the Cats.

Oh, and let's not forget the number of letters in DESTINY is seven and the number of home games for the Cats this year, seven.

I look forward to thousands of fans, both in the stands and at home, who honestly will be able to say they knew we'd win after it does happen. I believe it. Do you?

BLIND FAITH IN MESSAGE

Editor,

I am appalled, yet mildly amused by the liberal rally cry behind the Million Man March led by the Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan.

I guess the old hippies, the young liberal yuppies and civil-rights leaders have finally cashed in their chips, foregoing their hope for a touchy-feely world where everyone loves everyone else.

How can we as a society embrace a march led by such a hateful man as Farrakhan — a man who has repeatedly lashed Jews, Catholics, gays, Asians and the white population in general? How can liberals embrace a march that calls for the women to stay home and tend the children?

After all, don't liberals define this as sexism?

I've heard many liberals and civil-rights leaders excuse Farrakhan's statements saying, "We have to separate the message from the messenger." Others hold him acceptable because they feel he is the only leader that will speak out.

Well, if the Million Man March were a horse race, and all I had to run with was a jackass (Farrakhan), I believe I'd just stay home and denounce the race as unethical.

As a casual observer of the political tides of our nation, I hope the march was just a chance for liberals and civil-rights advocates to relive the glory days of the 1960s when marches and sit-ins were relatively commonplace. I also hope the "positive" message portrayed by the march is continued, but I fear the march might amount to a bunch of sheep blindly following a hateful, anti-semitic, anti-white wolf in sheep's clothing and a bowtie, who may just widen the gap in racial harmony.

Riding the fence between dual roles

I was approached by one of my students the other day who offered an excuse as to why he had missed umpteenth million days of my class and why he had flunked the last exam.

He was properly contrite and regretful. The excuse was tastefully given and seemed sincere. In fact, it was so sincere, I was surprised he'd never tried out for a theater production here. He was really good.

I was so moved, in fact, I wanted to give him extra credit for his performance. I probably would have if I hadn't been so peeved by it.

There was something about it, though, that made little bells go off in my head. It sounded familiar somehow, as if I had heard it all before. For the life of me, I couldn't figure out where or from whom I might have.

The answer came to me when I was sitting in class a little while later. I was the student this time, not a teacher, and thinking about my own projects that were coming due, I suddenly remembered why my student's excuse had sounded so familiar; it was one I had given to one of my teachers not long before.

It hadn't worked on them, either.

I think being a graduate teaching assistant is like being wedged between a rock and a hard place — your professors being one and your students being the other.

Since midterms have started, I feel as if I am acting like Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, unsure of who I am, where I stand, and how I got there.

Let me put it this way: If I could get all my professors in one room, I'd give them all a glass of champagne and a packed hookah, and I'd prostrate myself at their feet.

Then, I'd apologize profusely for every excuse, tirade, late paper, missed assignment, flunked test, stupid grandstanding stunt and immature flip remark I ever made in their classes.

I'd tell them I now understand the amount of time and energy they spent trying to help me nail down the act and art of learning. Like the rebellious child who becomes the parent of one, I comprehend what they were trying to accomplish for me and with me better than I ever had.

I am only sorry it has taken me so long to appreciate their efforts.

If I could get every one of my students in one room, I'd give them all a can of beer and a cigarette and tell them what a friend told me when I first started teaching.

She said my first few semesters as a teacher would be spent trying to find the balance between caring too much and too little about the success of my classes.

I've been trained not to feel responsible for my students' mistakes. It's not my fault if they don't study or read or ask questions.

College is about taking responsibility for your own education, and if they refuse that responsibility, I'm under no obligation to take that burden up for them.

The cheesy motto: I can only meet them halfway on the road. They have to walk the first few steps on their own.

That's all mush-mush crap though. The fact remains, for all the advice I have been given and in spite of all the training I've received, I do care. I care, and every time my students' eyes glaze while I am talking, or they don't ask a question when I know they're confused, I feel as if I haven't done something for them I could've.

And I hate that.

I hate that almost as much as I hate the sound someone chewing on tinfoil. It's irritating and because of it, I know I'm irritating.

I know I've been inconsistent; hard one minute, soft the next. Sometimes I present information in a way that's fun, and other days I sound like I am reading the dictionary in Swahili.

Some days I've done all my readings and finished all my projects, and other days I can't remember my own name.

But I am trying, as a teacher and as a student, to be what I'm required to be for both the roles I play. We all are. It's just it is a delicate balance and some days we're a bit more off kilter than others. Even the ones who have done it before.

Until the day we find the groove, expect us to be a stride behind and barely a step in the lead. If you want to help us get in it sooner, why not try to, at least, meet us halfway?

Top jazz musician, educator to play McCain Saturday

Rebecca Shulz
staff reporter

Clark Terry, one of America's top jazz players, will be performing at 8 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium.

Clark is coming to K-State as part of his year-long birthday tour. Clark's set will get back-up from the K-State Jazz Ensemble directed by Dennis Wilson, assistant professor of jazz studies.

"I think those who see him, those students will be impressed immeasurably," Wilson said. "Those students who get to work with him will be affected. They will never be the same."

Count Basie, Louis Armstrong and Duke Ellington are just a few jazz stars to have played with Clark and gleaned inspiration from his abilities, Wilson said.

Thus, Clark is known within the jazz community as an educator.

When Wilson attended the Berklee College of Music in Boston, Clark came to perform with the top jazz players there.

"I was put in the presence of those people who are of great distinction," Wilson said. "These people have so much to offer us. My joy is providing that opportunity."

Through Wilson's connections with Clark, the ensemble will be performing three pieces with Clark. The ensemble has prepared a surprise for Clark with a special arrangement of "Happy Birthday."

When Clark starts to play, the ensemble will break into its arrangement, Marc Riegel, senior in music education, said.

"The intro to the piece is not recognizable to happy birthday melody. Clark will not know what's going on," Riegel said.

Wilson said the band will be attempting "mumbling" with Clark. The set has no particular format. It is a array of jazz vibrations together with scat singing mixed with humorous dialogue from Clark. He became famous for this on the "Tonight Show" on NBC.

"Jazz transcends generations. Jazz is what jazz is and it can speak to all of us," Richard Martin, director of McCain Auditorium, said. "It's some of the most exciting music around."

Clark has lived jazz most of his life. Through his music, he has something to offer and is capable of reaching all different kinds of people, Martin said.

Clark is a very down-to-earth, humorous, dynamic musician who has earned the respect and admiration of the jazz community, Wilson said.

"Clark is a master," Wilson said. "Clark will play two trumpets at once. He will play it upside down. He's just so advanced. And he's 75."

Interactive computer system offers user-friendly format

Heather Stephany
staff reporter

A three-panel interactive computer system has been glaring at visitors outside the K-State Student Union Stateroom all week.

The system, which is called Interactive Kiosk Experience or IKE, has a grand opening Monday and Tuesday from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m., Jack Connaughton, associate director of the K-State Student Union, said.

IKE is divided into three sections. The middle portion of the unit displays campus information while the two remaining sections contain advertising. A scrolling screen will roll up-to-the-minute news from a wire service.

Nichole Stuck, freshman in pre-journalism and mass communications, said she thought a lot of students will use IKE.

"There is lots of information in one spot," she said. "You don't have to go hunting all over for it."

K-State was one of the first schools to sign up for IKE, which is offered by the Campus Interaction Company, based in Coral Gables, Fla.

Michael Hatch, computer and electrical coordinator at the Union, gathered the information for the campus portion and sent it to the company in August.

Because the information was sent in so early, more things need to be added, Hatch said. Originally they thought the system would arrive in late August.

"When things settle down, we will get more on," Hatch said.

In addition to the schedule of events, students can look at a campus map and telephone directory on IKE. Users will be able to print out the information and advertiser coupons. A telephone will be attached for on-campus calls.

"In the long run, there is the potential that the Kiosk system will be a part of campus information where students can look at their transcripts on the screen," Hatch said.

At this point, all the information for IKE is sent to Campus Interaction to be downloaded into the computer system or placed on a disc to load into the computer, Hatch said.

"Essentially, we're just doing the legwork," he said.

The legwork includes selling advertising space to local advertisers to support IKE, Connaughton said. National companies also advertise.

"It is all supported by advertisers," he said. "There is no capital investment by the Union."

Although the grand opening is not until next week, the display has been set up outside the Stateroom cafeteria and attracting students' attention.

"I was just messing around with it," Kale Yonkey, junior in agricultural technology management, said. "There should be a quite a few people using it to see what is on it. Curiosity will get them more than anything."

Sharon Davern, senior in geography, said IKE had a lot of the same information Unicorn has on it in a user-friendly format.

"A lot of people go into the lab and feel intimidated if they have never used a word processor or computer," she said. "It will attract a few more people than Unicorn, but not a lot."

Board of Regents names peers for all except KU, K-State

Associated Press

HAYS — The Kansas Board of Regents on Thursday accepted a task force recommendation naming new peer institutions for its four smaller schools, but it delayed a decision on peers for the University of Kansas and K-State.

The two larger institutions were told to report back on adjustments they could make to their peer selection model that will better reflect their research missions.

The regents began using peer institutions about 20 years ago for budget purposes. The theory has been that Kansas should attempt to keep pace on funding, staffing and operations with comparable institutions in states similar to Kansas.

The regents pointed to what peer institutions were getting from their legislatures whenever they felt the Kansas schools were falling behind financially.

Last June, the regents created a task force to review its peer system after being told the peers were a concern of legislators. State Sen. Gus Bogina said KU and K-State should be under no obligation to keep up with a pair of North Carolina schools used as peers.

The task force report said because of the state's present financial condition, the Kansas schools are unlikely to keep up financially with their peer schools in coming years.

Ron Downey, the task force chairman and a K-State representative, said an unfortunate side effect of choosing new peer institutions would be that the Legislature no longer would have a 15-year comparison to look at.

The University of Kansas' peer institutions are the Universities of Colorado, Iowa, North Carolina, Oklahoma and Oregon. K-State's peers have been the land grant state universities in those same five states.

Wichita State University's peers are the University of Akron, North Carolina-Greensboro, Portland (Ore.) State, Virginia Commonwealth, Wisconsin-Milwaukee and Western Michigan State.

The regional schools, Emporia State, Fort Hays State and Pittsburg State, share the same peers: Western Carolina, Eastern New Mexico, Central Oklahoma, Northern Arizona, Murray (Ky.) State and Eastern Washington.

For WSU, the task force recommended keeping Akron and Portland as peer institutions but replacing the others with Nevada-Las Vegas, Oakland University and Massachusetts-Lowell.

For the three regional universities, it recommended retaining Western Carolina and Eastern Washington and replacing the others with Northwest Missouri State, Salisbury State and Northern Michigan.

Chapman police chief, wife found dead

Associated Press

CHAPMAN — The police chief in this small northeast Kansas town and his wife were found shot to death in their home Thursday in an apparent murder-suicide.

Authorities had not released the identities of the victims Thursday afternoon. But sources close to the investigation and residents identified the dead as Donald J. Jones, 54, and his wife, Sharon L. Jones, 55.

Sharon Jones' mother, who lived at the home, heard the shooting and called police about 6:30 a.m., Dickinson County Sheriff Curt Bennett said.

Dickinson County Coroner Steve Schwarting's preliminary finding was that the deaths were a murder-suicide.

"The finding of the coroner was (the man) was shot by her, and then she took her own life," Bennett said. Authorities declined to say what kind of gun was used.

Chapman businessman Jon Londeen said residents in the town of 1,260 people, about 70 miles west of Topeka, were shocked by the shootings.

"You don't think of something like that happening in our little town," he said. "Chapman is like a lot of towns. They think they are immune from the shootings and gang activities."

Jones had been chief of Chapman's two-person police department since April 1992. Before then, he was an officer in the Abilene and Herington police departments.

Londeen, who is also a city councilman, said Jones was a thorough, organized chief who seemed to enjoy his job.

"He was a terrible worrier," Londeen said.

"He seemed a little more uptight in the past week or so."

Abilene assistant police chief Terry Payne, a longtime friend of the Joneses, also was stunned by the deaths.

"They always seemed well-liked wherever they went," Payne said. "They'd help you if they could. He enjoyed law enforcement work."

Sharon Jones had been suffering from failing health in recent years, but Payne said he did not know of any problems the couple had. The Joneses had been married about 30 years.

"I was shocked," Payne said. "He treated everyone as fair as he could. He had never had any problems here that I knew of."

The Joneses are survived by a daughter and a son.

Harker says attacker may be summer teammate

Shana Newell
staff writer

Every dark cloud must have a silver lining.

This past summer, K-State first baseman Brad Harker has had to look very hard to find his silver lining.

He stopped looking Sunday.

Late in the night on July 16, Harker was assaulted with a bat as he slept in the Triangle fraternity house at Ohio State University in Columbus.

Harker

Harker, junior in mass communications, was a member of the Columbus Americans, a summer collegiate baseball team.

Harker said he believes he knows the attacker, but the Columbus Police Department is still investigating and charges have not yet been filed.

"The night it happened was the All-Star game for our league. A bunch of us were waiting for the players from our team to come back so we could see how it went," Harker said. "It was getting late, so I decided to go to bed. I went to my room, did some sit-ups, and at one point went to the bathroom. After I went back to my room, I turned the lights off."

"Someone poked their head in the room and said good night. I said good night back, and the next thing, someone was in my room and hitting me with a bat."

Harker said that he recognized the person who said good night, and he believes it was the same person who attacked him only seconds later. Because it was dark, Harker was unable to see the person before the attack, making the investigation difficult.

"If it turns out to be the person I think it is, I will be really upset," Harker said.

"He was one of my closest friends on the team, and I put a lot of trust in him."

"It's really hard to think that someone on the team could do something like that," he said.

Harker was taken to the Ohio State University Medical Center after he was found early the next morning. He remained there for several weeks, and he said he was impressed with the attention he received.

"A lot of people think that at big hospitals the care is not very good, but the care I received was incredible," Harker said.

After he improved and doctors felt he was doing well, Harker was moved to a rehabilitation center in Columbus.

Jay and Susan Harker, Brad's parents, were able to be with their son almost continuously. Susan was in Columbus the entire time after the incident, while Jay flew in every weekend from Lawrence, Brad's hometown.

Harker said he received a phone call from Wefald Sunday night.

"Brad is an outstanding person who was doing extremely well academically before the assault. There is a commitment on our part at K-State to that education," Wefald said.

"We just wanted to indicate that at K-State our hearts go out to Brad, and we're delighted he's doing well."

Wefald said Harker will receive an academic scholarship to cover tuition and fees for the remainder of his undergraduate studies when he returns to K-State.

"He is very worthy of an academic scholarship, and we support him and his efforts here at K-State," Wefald said.

Harker said Wefald caught him by surprise when he offered the scholarship.

"I was just awestruck," he said. "It was great, and it shows how much the people in Manhattan supported me."

Harker also said that both Wefald and K-State baseball coach Mike Clark were very supportive throughout the summer.

"I really appreciate Wefald's support from day one, and I also want to thank Coach Clark for all his support. He came to visit me in Columbus several times," Harker said.

His teammates from the K-State baseball team showed their support for Harker by meeting him at the Kansas City airport when he arrived last week.

"When I landed in Kansas City, they were all there," he said.

"They all came back to Lawrence with us and had some pizza and hung out before they went back to Manhattan."

Harker said he is very hopeful that he will return to K-State next semester.

"I'm doing great cognitively, and physically I can get up and move around some."

"The doctors are on the same level that I am at and are even talking about 'When you return to school in January ...,'" he said.

But Harker said he is hoping to return to Manhattan even before this semester is over, if only for a weekend, but it has to be a special weekend.

"With my doctor's approval, I'm hoping I can go to the K-State/KU football game next weekend. I'm really hoping," Harker said.

Cats face nation's best offense in Lincoln

Dan Lewerenz and Chris May
Collegian

At his weekly press conference Tuesday, K-State coach Bill Snyder — in his usual, low-key manner — said Saturday's game against Nebraska was not the most important game of the year.

"This isn't the totality of the program," Snyder said.

"But certainly everyone walks a little bit faster, and their heart rate gets higher."

The No. 8 Wildcats have been installed as 24-1/2-point underdogs as they prepare to visit the No. 2 Cornhuskers in a game that could decide the Big 8 conference and have national implications.

Yet despite the hype and the Cats' first television appearance of the season, Snyder said he is not letting the fanfare interfere with the way he prepares.

"I can't speak for everyone on the team, but personally, that's very unimportant to me," Snyder said. "I don't really pay attention to it, because it's not very important. It may affect us but it won't affect our preparation."

What the Cats will prepare for is the Husker offense, the most prolific in the country.

Led by senior quarterback Tommie Frazier, Nebraska's offense averages 626 yards per game.

"You watch Tommie Frazier run the option, and he gets the ball up field. It's not a one-dimensional thing. They've got their running backs and their quarterback, and you can't ever forget their fullback. Every time we play them, as soon as we defend those other things, they flip it to the fullback, and he runs it in the end zone," Snyder said.

"Then you cap that off with what makes everything go — a tremendous offensive line."

Perhaps the greatest threat in that offense is the assortment of running backs the Huskers throw at their opponents.

Starting true freshman Ahman Green averages 9.3 yards per carry, and back-ups Damon Benning, Clinton Childs and Jeff Makovicka all average more than 7 yards.

"We're going to be facing some really great backs coming up," line-backer Percell Gaskins said.

"And we've got to get ready for that."

But Snyder said playing the entire team, not just the running backs, was most important.

"They're all good. And you've got to defend against all of them. But we've got to defend against the offense as a whole."

To do that, the Cats will diversify their defense, mixing up coverages in an attempt to keep the Huskers on their toes.

"We have to be as unpredictable as we can," Snyder said. "And in order to do that we can't put all our eggs in one basket. We have to be a zone team a substantial amount of the time, and we also have to be a man-to-man team."

Snyder said if the Cats can be effective on both sides of the ball and avoid mistakes, K-State can win against the Huskers.

"They're an awfully good football team, and you can't make mistakes with them."

"I think if you play well and put it all together on both sides of the ball, you definitely have a chance," Snyder said.

Defensive end Dirk Ochs agreed and said he is confident the K-State offense will be able to produce against the Huskers.

"If they don't score, we won't lose the game," Ochs said, "because our offense will score points."

Though this may not be the biggest game of the year, Snyder said beating Nebraska would be a big step for K-State football.

"Obviously this is something we have not accomplished here, and it would be a big step."

Cats will need a perfect game to overcome Nebraska

Add up every break and lucky bounce the K-State football team has been the beneficiary of so far this season. Now multiply that by four.

All of that will be needed to beat Nebraska on Saturday, and then some.

Quarterback Matt Miller will need a near-perfect game. Miller's too-common end-zone interceptions will not be acceptable. He does not need to make things happen on his own and instead needs to let things come to him.

The days of Miller imitating a running back will have to come to an end because this Cornhusker defense is too quick on its feet to allow Miller to run all over the field. He will have to learn when to throw the ball away.

Running backs Mike Lawrence and Eric Hickson will have to take what the Cornhusker defense gives them. The Cats will be better off with plays of 3 or 4 yards a pop, as opposed to one 15-yard run. And more importantly, one tailback fumble will be one too many.

The offensive player with the biggest burden on his shoulders heading into the Nebraska game is wide receiver Kevin Lockett. It's going to be important for K-State to keep its offense conservative, but when the Cats do need a big play, Lockett will be the man to go to.

Lockett should be able to beat any cornerback in the Big 8 deep at least three times a game and will have to find a way to get open during crucial third-downs.

Lockett cannot depend on Mitch Running or Tyson Schwieger to come through; it is totally up to him.

But a near-perfect offense by itself will not be enough for the Cats to come away from Lincoln with a win. The defense must shine.

Few question marks remain over the play of the secondary — it has proven itself solid as a rock. But this Cornhusker offense is a run-oriented attack, and the key for the Cats will be the play of the front seven.

Defensive tackles Tim Colston and Ray Eagle must get penetration through the huge Cornhusker offensive line and get their hands on Nebraska running backs before they break the line of scrimmage. Interior linebackers Travis Ochs and DeShawn Fogle cannot miss tackles and allow big Nebraska runs.

When Nebraska does pass, the secondary cannot find itself cheating the run and get beat deep. If Nebraska is allowed to throw against the Cats, it is all over.

Coach Bill Snyder must concentrate on rotating fresh people into the game and not let the bigger, stronger Cornhuskers wear down the K-State front lines.

So that's it — with a near-perfect game from Miller, a smart game from the running backs, big plays from Lockett and smart defense is the recipe for success in Lincoln.

If all of the above happen, the score will be K-State 17, Nebraska 13.

If any one of the above doesn't happen, it will be a K-State loss.

If too many of the above falter, it's a Nebraska rout.

Perfection — the only hope in Lincoln.

► NETTERS 'NEED TO WIN' AGAINST MISSOURI

Though K-State defeated Wichita State Wednesday, Coach Jim Moore said he is not satisfied with the victory.

"We could have played better," Moore said of squad's performance.

The Wildcats will have an opportunity to play better when Missouri visits Manhattan. The match begins at 7:30 Saturday night in Ahearn Field House.

K-State enters the match 15-5 overall and 2-3 in the Big 8.

Moore said that the team is improving, but it still needs to loosen up its game.

"We're starting to play better, but we still need to learn how to play relaxed and how to play to have fun," he said.

The squad is led by junior play-set-hitter Yolanda "Toie" Young, junior middle blocker Kate DeClerk, senior hitter Jill Dugan and sophomore setter Devon Rynning.

Young is hitting .226 against conference foes with 70 kills. DeClerk is hitting .364 against Big 8 opponents. In Big 8 play, Dugan leads the team in digs with 76. Rynning has 257 set assists in conference play, averaging 13.5 per game.

Moore said Saturday's match against Missouri is one that the Cats must win to stay in the Big 8 race as the team is fighting for third place in the conference.

"It is a match we need to win," Moore said.

The Sigma Nus have an extended family member who watches their volleyball court and members' cars from the doorway of a dog igloo.

Morgan, a Dalmatian, belongs to Grant Andres, sophomore in professional pilot aviation. Andres said he takes an interest in his dog's health and is looking forward to celebrating Morgan's first birthday Nov. 24.

"He is like one of the family and around the Sigma Nu house. He is a brother," he said.

Andres said he learned from his veterinarian about the possibility of Morgan contracting Parvo.

Parvo is a virus that attacks rapidly by dividing cells in dogs, Heidi Hummelman, K-State veterinarian and intern in small animal medicine and surgery, said.

"The main cells attacked are in the lining of the intestinal track," Hummelman said.

Dogs are affected, but cats cannot get Parvo, she said.

"It is a very, very serious disease and can be fatal," she said.

If people are going to invest a lot of money and emotional attachment with their dogs, they need to get them vaccinated, Andres said.

When getting a puppy, ask lots of questions, he said.

"Ask about medical history of the mother and father, if possible, and ask if the puppy has had any shots," he said.

New puppies should be vaccinated as soon as possible, Hummelman said.

"I see it most often in puppies who are under 9 months old," Linda Kalmar, veterinarian with the Little Apple Veterinary Clinic, said.

The American Veterinary Medical Association recommends to start your puppy's shots at 3 to 6 weeks old and have them continuously until the puppy is 18 to 20 weeks old, she said.

"I recommend shots every three weeks for puppies," she said.

Dogs get the virus when they come into contact with infected feces, Hummelman said.

"When you take your puppy to the park, and other dogs have been in the park, this is where all the infected feces is," she said.

Humans, otherwise, cannot actually carry the disease to their dogs, Kalmar said.

"If a human comes in contact with infected feces by stepping in it or if a dog, who is infected, with Parvo licks you on the hand and you do not wash your hands, then you can give your dog the virus," she said.

Anytime dogs are not vaccinated, they are put at risk, she said.

Recently, Parvo has affected animals in the Manhattan and Riley County area, Hummelman said.

"K-State Veterinary Hospital averages about one or two cases per week," she said.

Kalmar said the Little Apple Veterinary Clinic has had three cases since spring.

"Hot weather was the reason we had two of these cases," she said.

During the spring and summer, there is more dog-to-dog contact, with people walking their dogs or just letting them run, she said.

"Since in the winter there is less contact between dogs, the number of cases decrease," she said.

It is rare to see Parvo in dogs more than 2 years old because they have developed an immunity to it, Hummelman said.

"Because puppies are new to it and they do not have a strong immune system, this is why they are at the highest risk," she said.

However, very elderly dogs that have lapsed on their vaccinations can lose their immunity and still get it, Kalmar said.

"To avoid your dog's chances at getting the Parvo virus, I recommend annual shots," Kalmar said.

Puppy and dog shots include vaccinations for Parvo, booster, distemper and Adeno virus, Hummelman said.

Some other symptoms other than vomiting are depression, lack of appetite, dehydration, bloody diarrhea and excessive drooling, she said.

"Prevention is far easier than treatment," she said. "And it is cheaper."

UNIVERSITY OF KANSAS

KU merges, keeps departments

Jamie Wiley
staff reporter

The University of Kansas will be merging several departments instead of eliminating departments as the Topeka Capitol Journal reported.

Lindi Eakin, associate executive vice chancellor for KU, said the Topeka Capitol Journal article was misleading and caused a lot of confusion.

"I've spent a lot of time on the phone," Eakin said.

Sally Frost-Mason, dean of Arts and Sciences, said the news brief sounded bad for the university.

"It made it sound like we were going to shut departments down and people would get fired," Frost-Mason said.

Instead, Eakin said the Kansas Board of Regents suggested KU merge and cut the number of departments so the university will have larger and more efficient departments.

"In 1992, as a result of the program review process, we committed to the board that we would cut 10 departments," Eakin said.

The number of departments has already been cut by three, and the university plans to cut the number of departments in the College of Liberal Arts by four, the School of Education by two and the School of Engineering by one, Eakin said.

Frost-Mason said the decision of which departments to merge is a process that will start from the departments and then pass to the administration. She said the decision will be a collective one and feedback from students and faculty will be encouraged.

Eakin said KU has 69 departments in the university compared to an average of 50 departments among other Kansas Board of Regents universities.

KU's high number of departments means the university has many small departments and a large number of administration members, Eakin said.

Eakin said one problem with small departments is some only have seven or eight faculty members. A small number of faculty members causes difficulties when trying to find a replacement within the department for a chairperson who steps down.

"In a couple cases, it makes pretty good academic sense to look at our structure. Where it makes sense to merge departments, I think, it is a good idea," Frost-Mason said.

Frost-Mason said some departments want to be consolidated.

Western Civilization and Humanities departments want to be consolidated because it would make good academic sense, Frost-Mason said.

Eakin said decisions about department consolidation will be made during this academic school year, and the departments will be merged toward the end of the spring 1997 semester.

Ron Downey, director of institutional research and analysis at K-State, said K-State eliminated several programs and degrees within recent years as part of its role and aspiration process initiated by the Board of Regents.

Downey said KU also went through the same process.

"They went through the same process trying to position itself for the future by dropping degrees and merging departments," Downey said.

Group entertains, informs students

Holly McConkey

Sometimes laughter is the best medicine.

At least that's what five students, who travel around the nation teaching young people about sensitive social issues concerning sex, drugs and alcohol, said Thursday in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

The group traveled from Fort Hays State University and performed skits yesterday for more than 100 K-State and Manhattan High School students, as a part of National Collegiate Alcohol Awareness week.

The peer theater group, Tiger by the Tale, performs at junior highs, high schools and colleges around the country to educate in a realistic way audiences can relate to.

"We don't throw statistics or gory pictures at them, but we try to be as realistic as possible," Paul Hunt, group member, said.

The skits included themes dealing with suicide, safe sex and the effects of alcohol on relationships.

"We do deal with a lot of serious matters, but we try to keep it light and fun," Natalie Vandever, group member, said. "We try to do it in a teaching, not a preaching way."

The crowd roared with laughter when the group showed how alcohol can affect your life, by doing a spoof from the movie "Forrest Gump."

"Hello, My name is Forrest, Forrest Drunk. My momma always told me life is like an endless stream of garbage."

Jelena Jovanovic, assistant director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Services, said the alcohol awareness week activities are about raising the awareness of responsible use of alcohol.

The theater group is a good way to educate students, Jovanovic said.

"The whole point is not to be all serious. It's suppose to be a funny way to look at these issues," she said.

The skits the group performs are made up by Tiger by the Tale members and are not written down in a script, Hunt said.

"Our scenes evolve. Nothing is written down, and it's not scripted. New things keep cropping up like mold," he said. "We continue to add to it and hope it gets better."

Jovanovic said the skits were a great way to get the message out to many students.

ANTIBIOTICS

Diseases becoming drug-resistant

Heidi Evert

Gonorrhea, meningitis, surgical wound infections, urinary tract infections, malaria and pneumonia are no longer easily curable infections.

Julian Davies, professor and department chairman of microbiology and immunology at the University of British Columbia, said the microbes are becoming drug resistant.

During his all-University Convocation Lecture Thursday, Davies said microbes develop mechanisms of resistance to counteract the activities of the antibiotics by spontaneously mutating.

"Microbes are sexually promiscuous," Davies said.

Microbes have the ability to acquire resistance and interchange genetic information very easily, he said. Some microbes are actually aphrodisiacs for the interchanging of resistance genes.

The human race is running out of antibiotics, and a new chemical structure has not been made since 1981, he said.

New chemical structures have not been developed because infectious diseases were thought to not be a serious problem anymore, and researchers' focus switched to cancer, he said.

Davies said humans cannot live without microbes, but there is not a war between humans and microbes. Humans simply need to look for a reasonable coexistence.

"Don't try to wipe them out. Control them, yes, but don't try to wipe them out," Davies said. "We need to understand the enemy."

Humans need to get to know and understand more about microbes to effectively change the situation.

"It's not just the fault of the medical and pharmaceutical worlds," Davies said. "It's everybody's fault."

Dr. Gerald Mowry, a retired obstetrician, thought Davies delivered an excellent speech.

► KANSAS UNIVERSITIES

K-State, KU attempting to prevent student money from leaving campus

■ Universities hope to keep tuition accountability

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

K-State is trying to keep more of the tuition students pay on campus.

Through the tuition accountability plan, K-State and the University of Kansas hope to increase the amount of tuition the universities keep.

They also want to stabilize the ratio between tuition and the amount of money the universities receive from the state general fund.

Tuition accountability has two significant components to it, John Struve, budget office director, said. The University prepares a budget in August based on tuition estimates, which make up one-third of the K-State budget.

The other two-thirds of the budget are filled in by the State of Kansas from the general fund.

As the amount of money taken in from tuition increases, the amount of money the state takes from the general fund for K-State's budget decreases.

"Tuition is now paying a greater and greater amount of our budget," Struve said. "What is happening at KU and K-State in particular is that we are falling behind our peer institutions in funding."

Under tuition accountability, the University would be able to begin making up some of the difference between its funding and the funding levels of its peer institutions.

"It does nothing but benefit the University," said Aaron Otto, Student Senate Governmental Relations Committee chairman.

The components of the plan will be in place when linear tuition begins next fall, he said.

No tax increase will be needed to bring more funding to the University with tuition accountability.

Senate passed a resolution in support of tuition accountability Thursday night.

"The reason Student Senate voted for it is because it gives the University more money for the number of students we will have," Otto said.

The University would keep 25 percent of all tuition increases above a baseline tuition level. The other 75 percent would go into the state general fund.

"Tuition goes up 8 percent next year, which means we would get to keep 2 percent here at K-State," Otto said.

Along with increases in tuition levels, the University also expects enrollment to grow over the next five to eight years, Struve said.

He said the universities are hoping to keep the ratio between the general fund contribution and baseline tuition at the two-thirds to one-third.

Tuition accountability as proposed by K-State and KU would stop the current practice of lowering the amount of money universities get from the state when they have enrollment increases.

Although tuition accountability will mean a bigger budget when University enrollment figures are high, when enrollment is down, the budget could shrink.

Under the current system, the state fills in the difference between actual tuition and estimated tuition when enrollment is lower than expected.

Under the University's proposal, the state would not be expected to fill in difference with general funds.

"The way we're proposing tuition accountability, we have to take that risk," Struve said. "We have to share the good with the bad in order to sell this with the Legislature."

Because the Kansas Legislature would not have to allocate funds to fill in the University's budget, K-State will have to change the way it budgets.

"The budget will be a little more fluid," he said. "The budget will change based upon tuition revenues."

Struve said he did not expect tuition accountability to dramatically lower the budget.

"The University would have more of a chance to expand and contract," he said.

The Kansas Board of Regents has already approved tuition accountability. The plan will be presented to the Legislature in January.

"We have submitted our budget to the governor's office requesting tuition accountability," Struve said.

The budget is the fiscal year 1997 budget. Fiscal year 1997 begins on July 1, 1996, and ends on June 30, 1997.

The Division of the Budget will release its recommendations around Nov. 10, and Gov. Bill Graves will release his budget recommendations in January, he said.

"Then it enters the legislative process for the next four months," Struve said.

Tuition accountability would go into effect in fall 1996 if it is passed during the 1996 legislative session.

"If students are interested in letting their legislators know they support tuition accountability, they should have their parents write their legislators from home," Struve said.

► CITY COMMISSION

Neighborhood association opposes waste site

Cori Cornelson
staff reporter

South Manhattan Neighborhood Association members voiced their concerns to city commissioners concerning a proposal for a 10-county, household hazardous waste site to be relocated to south Manhattan.

The proposal, which is still in the planning stages, entails a portable unit to be set up for household hazardous waste across the street from Howie's Recycling Inc., Karen McCulloh, county commissioner on the recycling committee, said in a telephone interview after the meeting.

Household hazardous wastes include paint, cleaning products, varnish and any other toxic household products. The fumes from these products can be toxic in some cases and can cause fires.

If Riley County were to implement the project, then the proposed site, at 10th Street and Fort Riley Boulevard, would be leased by the county from Howard Wilson, owner of Howie's.

McCulloh said a new location would not change anything. She said the county already has a 10-county household hazardous waste site at the County Facility Shop near Westloop Shopping Center.

County commissioners picked the site across from Howie's because it would be a convenient place where people could drop off their recyclables and waste in one consolidated area, and it would be a nicer facility, she said.

Breta Bloomberg-Ellis, south Manhattan resident, said the proposal is a county project, but it is in the city and her neighborhood.

She said she is very concerned about a proposed hazardous waste site being in a residential area.

"We're forgetting the big picture here," she said. "I don't care if it's household, industrial or whatever it is. It shouldn't be here."

"We all have it, but it doesn't mean we should be the dumping ground for 10 counties."

Bloomberg-Ellis said the county should find a dumping ground outside of the city.

Commissioner Steve Hall said he was surprised the county would propose a hazardous site in close proximity to Truth Park, in which the city has invested money.

Some of the places that are within five or fewer blocks of the proposed site are Truth Park, Douglas Center, Wildcat Creek and Manhattan Middle School.

Delesa Rhodeman, south Manhattan resident, said the city already has batteries, air conditioners and refrigerators at Howie's that aren't being taken care of. A hazardous waste station is just another problem the city will have to worry about, she said.

Gonorrhea, meningitis, surgical wound infections, urinary tract infections, malaria and pneumonia are no longer easily curable infections.

Julian Davies, professor and department chairman of microbiology and immunology at the University of British Columbia, said the microbes are becoming drug resistant.

During his all-University Convocation Lecture Thursday, Davies said microbes develop mechanisms of resistance to counteract the activities of the antibiotics by spontaneously mutating.

"Microbes are sexually promiscuous," Davies said.

Microbes have the ability to acquire resistance and interchange genetic information very easily, he said. Some microbes are actually aphrodisiacs for the interchanging of resistance genes.

The human race is running out of antibiotics, and a new chemical structure has not been made since 1981, he said.

New chemical structures have not been developed because infectious diseases were thought to not be a serious problem anymore, and researchers' focus switched to cancer, he said.

Davies said humans cannot live without microbes, but there is not a war between humans and microbes. Humans simply need to look for a reasonable coexistence.

"Don't try to wipe them out. Control them, yes, but don't try to wipe them out," Davies said. "We need to understand the enemy."

Humans need to get to know and understand more about microbes to effectively change the situation.

"It's not just the fault of the medical and pharmaceutical worlds," Davies said. "It's everybody's fault."

Dr. Gerald Mowry, a retired obstetrician, thought Davies delivered an excellent speech.

Group entertains, informs students

Holly McConkey
staff reporter

Sometimes laughter is the best medicine.

At least that's what five students, who travel around the nation teaching young people about sensitive social issues concerning sex, drugs and alcohol, said Thursday in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

The group traveled from Fort Hays State University and performed skits yesterday for more than 100 K-State and Manhattan High School students, as a part of National Collegiate Alcohol Awareness week.

The peer theater group, Tiger by the Tale, performs at junior highs, high schools and colleges around the country to educate in a realistic way audiences can relate to.

"We don't throw statistics or gory pictures at them, but we try to be as realistic as possible," Paul Hunt, group member, said.

The skits included themes dealing with suicide, safe sex and the effects of alcohol on relationships.

"We do deal with a lot of serious matters, but we try to keep it light and fun," Natalie Vandever, group member, said. "We try to do it in a teaching, not a preaching way."

The crowd roared with laughter when the group showed how alcohol can affect your life, by doing a spoof from the movie "Forrest Gump."

"Hello. My name is Forrest. Forrest Drunk. My momma always told me life is like an endless stream of garbage."

Jelena Jovanovic, assistant director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Services, said the alcohol awareness week activities are about raising the awareness of responsible use of alcohol.

The theater group is a good way to educate students, Jovanovic said.

"The whole point is not to be all serious. It's suppose to be a funny way to look at these issues," she said.

The skits the group performs are made up by Tiger by the Tale members and are not written down in a script, Hunt said.

"Our scenes evolve. Nothing is written down, and it's not scripted. New things keep cropping up like mold," he said. "We continue to add to it and hope it gets better."

Jovanovic said the skits were a great way to get the message out to many students.

► KANSAS UNIVERSITIES

K-State, KU attempting to prevent student money from leaving campus

Universities hope to keep tuition accountability

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

K-State is trying to keep more of the tuition students pay on campus.

Through the tuition accountability plan, K-State and the University of Kansas hope to increase the amount of tuition the universities keep.

They also want to stabilize the ratio between tuition and the amount of money the universities receive from the state general fund.

Tuition accountability has two significant components to it, John Struve, budget office director, said. The University prepares a budget in August based on tuition estimates, which make up one-third of the K-State budget.

The other two-thirds of the budget are filled in by the State of Kansas from the general fund.

As the amount of money taken in from tuition increases, the amount of money the state takes from the general fund for K-State's budget decreases.

"Tuition is now paying a greater and greater amount of our budget," Struve said. "What is happening at KU and K-State in particular is that we are falling behind our peer institutions in funding."

Under tuition accountability, the University would be able to begin making up some of the difference between its funding and the funding levels of its peer institutions.

"It does nothing but benefit the University," said Aaron Otto, Student Senate Governmental Relations Committee chairman.

The components of the plan will be in place when linear tuition begins next fall, he said.

No tax increase will be needed to bring more funding to the University with tuition accountability.

Senate passed a resolution in support of tuition accountability Thursday night.

"The reason Student Senate voted for it is because it gives the University more money for the number of students we will have," Otto said.

The University would keep 25 percent of all tuition increases above a baseline tuition level. The other 75 percent would go into the state general fund.

"Tuition goes up 8 percent next year, which means we would get to keep 2 percent here at K-State," Otto said.

Along with increases in tuition levels, the University also expects enrollment to grow over the next five to eight years, Struve said.

He said the universities are hoping to keep the ratio between the general fund contribution and baseline tuition at the two-thirds to one-third.

Tuition accountability as proposed by K-State and KU would stop the current practice of lowering the amount of money universities get from the state when they have enrollment increases.

Although tuition accountability will mean a bigger budget when University enrollment figures are high, when enrollment is down, the budget could shrink.

Under the current system, the state fills in the difference between actual tuition and estimated tuition when enrollment is lower than expected.

Under the University's proposal, the state would not be expected to fill in difference with general funds.

"The way we're proposing tuition accountability, we have to take that risk," Struve said. "We have to share the good with the bad in order to sell this with the Legislature."

Because the Kansas Legislature would not have to allocate funds to fill in the University's budget, K-State will have to change the way it budgets.

"The budget will be a little more fluid," he said. "The budget will change based upon tuition revenues."

Struve said he did not expect tuition accountability to dramatically lower the budget.

"The University would have more of a chance to expand and contract," he said.

The Kansas Board of Regents has already approved tuition accountability. The plan will be presented to the Legislature in January.

"We have submitted our budget to the governor's office requesting tuition accountability," Struve said.

The budget is the fiscal year 1997 budget. Fiscal year 1997 begins on July 1, 1996, and ends on June 30, 1997.

The Division of the Budget will release its recommendations around Nov. 10, and Gov. Bill Graves will release his budget recommendations in January, he said.

"Then it enters the legislative process for the next four months," Struve said.

Tuition accountability would go into effect in fall 1996 if it is passed during the 1996 legislative session.

"If students are interested in letting their legislators know they support tuition accountability, they should have their parents write their legislators from home," Struve said.

Jennifer Whitlock, a sophomore in pre-vet, tries to keep the ball away from Stephanie Wesemann, senior in architecture, Thursday afternoon on the south side of the Memorial Stadium. The two were practicing with the K-State women's lacrosse team.

► CITY COMMISSION

Neighborhood association opposes waste site

Cori Cornelison
staff reporter

South Manhattan Neighborhood Association members voiced their concerns to city commissioners concerning a proposal for a 10-county, household hazardous waste site to be relocated to south Manhattan.

The proposal, which is still in the planning stages, entails a portable unit to be set up for household hazardous waste across the street from Howie's Recycling Inc., Karen McCulloh, county commissioner on the recycling committee, said in a telephone interview after the meeting.

Household hazardous wastes include paint, cleaning products, varnish and any other toxic household products. The fumes from these products can be toxic in some cases and can cause fires.

If Riley County were to implement the project, then the proposed site, at 10th Street and Fort Riley Boulevard, would be leased by the county from Howard Wilson, owner of Howie's.

McCulloh said a new location would not change anything. She said the county already has a 10-county household hazardous waste site at the County Facility Shop near Westloop Shopping Center.

County commissioners picked the site across from Howie's because it would be a convenient place where people could drop off their recyclables and waste in one consolidated area, and it would be a nicer facility, she said.

Breta Bloomberg-Ellis, south Manhattan resident, said the proposal is a county project, but it is in the city and her neighborhood.

She said she is very concerned about a proposed hazardous waste site being in a residential area.

"We're forgetting the big picture

here," she said. "I don't care if it's household, industrial or whatever it is. It shouldn't be here."

"We all have it, but it doesn't mean we should be the dumping ground for 10 counties."

Bloomberg-Ellis said the county should find a dumping ground outside of the city.

Commissioner Steve Hall said he was surprised the county would propose a hazardous site in close proximity to Truth Park, in which the city has invested money.

Some of the places that are within five or fewer blocks of the proposed site are Truth Park, Douglas Center, Wildcat Creek and Manhattan Middle School.

Delesa Rhodeman, south Manhattan resident, said the city already has batteries, air conditioners and refrigerators at Howie's that aren't being taken care of. A hazardous waste station is just another problem the city will have to worry about, she said.

Roll-your-own music: Blues, country all in 1

contributing writer

The Manhattan Arts Center's Bird House acoustic music series will present the undefinable eclectic eloquence of Katy Moffatt at 8 p.m. Saturday, along with local musician Ann Zimmerman.

A combination of traditional folk, blues and country keeps Texas-native Moffatt dodging labels, but her style has been compared to K.D. Lang, Mary Chapin-Carpenter and Nanci Griffith.

Under her belt are seven recordings, including Rounder/Philo Records 1989 "Walkin' On the Moon," "Child Bride" in 1990, and "The Greatest Show On Earth" in 1993, which is now called "The Evangeline Hotel." It was self-released on her own Country Music Liberation Organization, (C M L O) Productions.

Her latest recording is "Hearts Gone Wild," on Watermelon Records and is available in Manhattan Record stores.

Zimmerman, an accomplished musician with her first release "Love and Weather," will open for Moffatt.

Raised in Salina, Zimmerman's travels have given her the opportunity to be host to a weekly open-mike night at the Alaskan Hotel in Juneau, Alaska, during a summer internship with the Sierra Club Defense Fund.

She has been involved in the Skeptical Gospel Quartet and does the arrangement for its music.

Beyond the territory marked by her musical endeavors, Zimmerman is a graduate of Harvard Law School and spent seven years as a legal aid attorney with Kansas Legal Services.

Prior to law school, Zimmerman worked as an inner city elementary school teacher, a bank clerk, a plumbing catalog editor and an agricultural intern.

Zimmerman is taking a break from the law in order to focus on writing new music.

"A majority of the songs are not political, partly because when I spend all day dealing with high-conflict political things, I don't want to come home and sing about it," she said.

Zimmerman said she hopes this sabbatical will give her the distance that will enable her to finally incorporate some of these issues into her song writing.

"As I get away from work, I'll be able to write about it," she said. "Before, I just wanted to get away from it at the end of the day. I've always been into social causes."

Zimmerman said she is glad to see the horizon opening up for opportunities in the local music scene through Bird House Productions and the Manhattan Arts Center.

"This kind of music is best with a lot of people, and it doesn't do as well in a noisy bar or even a crowded coffee house," she said.

"With this kind of music, the words are important, and it's better for them to come to listen to the music than to come to have conversation with a little background music."

'Feast of July' features 'terrific ensemble cast'

Associated Press

If you have fond memories of such Merchant-Ivory productions as "Room With a View" and "Howard's End" you're likely to be drawn to "Feast of July."

It's not quite in the league of these earlier works, and it is darker and more tragic. But it certainly features the signature style of director James Ivory and producer Ismail Merchant: rich visuals, intelligent story and sensitive acting.

And then there's the star, Embeth Davidtz, hauntingly memorable as the Nazi commandant's bruised but unbowed maid in "Schindler's List."

Here, she's the mysterious Bella Ford, a desperate woman seduced and abandoned in rural Victorian England who gets a second chance at happiness after a terrifying miscarriage.

Bella's search for the man who told her he would marry her comes to rest on the outskirts of a small town, where she is rescued by a kindly farmer (Tom Bell) and his family.

She spends several nights recovering from her ordeal. And despite the misgivings of the wife (Gemma Jones), who senses bad luck, the family agrees to let her stay.

It just so happens that the mother has three attractive and eligible sons. Jedd (James Purefoy) is a soldier who thinks he's great with women. Matty (Kenneth Anderson) is a talented shoemaker who wants to keep shop in the big city.

The third son, Con (Ben Chaplin), is spacey, erratic and mercurial. But he's very handsome and is the first to express his undying love.

The pretty Bella flirts with each of the sons, and each of the young men makes his own unique version of a play for her.

These courting scenes — played out in summer fields, and dances at harvest celebrations — are rich, ripe and bucolic, but there is an underlying tension, a sense that there is a danger under the surface waiting to explode.

Maybe it's something about the wariness of the farmer's wife. She's like a dog growling at the door on a seemingly tranquil night at home.

She never completely accepts Bella and very reluctantly gives her blessing when Bella finally settles on Con.

And when Con meets up with Bella's seducer (Greg Wise), we begin to see that the mother's premonitions may have been right.

If you can make it through the slow, first 20 minutes, you're likely to get caught up in the finely drawn characters and their fates.

The movie features a terrific ensemble cast, held together by director Christopher Menaul, best known for his fine work on PBS' "Prime Suspect."

The four young men are unbelievable and subtly played, but you can't help get the feeling that the actors aren't just competing for Bella's attention, they're also vying to become the next crossover star to emerge from a British-made movie.

Jones and Wainwright put in sturdy, but touching performances as the plain-spoken and honorable parents.

But it is Davidtz who really holds the center of the movie with her expressive face and beguiling smile.

"Feast of July" is distributed by Touchstone Pictures and rated R for mild sexual content and one harrowing birth scene.

The screenplay is by Christopher Neame from a novel by H.E. Bates. Neame and Henry Herbert are producers. The executive producers are Ismail Merchant and Paul Bradley.

Leaders urged to form court

Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — Amnesty International urged world leaders Thursday to establish a permanent court to try crimes against humanity when they meet here this weekend for the 50th anniversary of the United Nations.

The leaders are expected to issue a declaration at the end of the three-day ceremonies, but Amnesty International said it ignores the need to end impunity for those responsible for genocide and other grave human rights violations.

"This declaration should call for prompt action to establish a permanent international court which could bring to justice those responsible for genocide, other crimes against humanity and serious violations of humanitarian law," the London-based human rights organization said.

The draft of the statement has not been officially released but copies have been circulated around member states' missions. In Israel, the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial urged Israel to boycott the anniversary ceremonies because the Holocaust is not specifically mentioned.

In its statement, Amnesty International applauded Security Council decisions to establish temporary international tribunals to prosecute human rights violations in Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia but described them as a stopgap.

"There is no justification to have temporary tribunals for permanent problems," Amnesty International said. "It is now up to the General Assembly to establish quickly a permanent court which would try suspects in all countries."

me a lot," Brenda Schaffer, parent and K-State employee, said. "I think it's a great program to be involved in, and it has a lot of things that most day care centers wouldn't have because they don't have the money."

"My son really likes it," Schaffer said. "They take the kids to swimming lessons in the summer and to the library. They do things that I can't do because I'm at work."

Heptig said she likes the fact that the children are picked up at school because she doesn't have to worry about her children walking those couple of blocks to the center.

Oakley said she is going to apply for the grant again because one of the hardest things to maintain is quality.

The center's grant is part of the welfare bill and would be eliminated if proposed Congressional cutbacks are passed, Oakley said. She said without the money, it would be difficult to maintain the quality of the program because things are constantly breaking.

"We have a way to go," Bartel said, "but we've made huge improvements since I came here in August, and I'm gaining confidence in the program every day."

"I know this campaign happened at Emporia, and my friends there said it was a success," Scott said.

Scott was contacted by friends in the theater and English departments who heard of the Safe Zone project and were interested in more information.

"I think there will be many in support of this and some who won't be," Scott said.

The Safe Zone project was thought of in May, but not much work was done on it during the summer. Then BGLS had a change in leadership and the new presidents have just completed work on a conference.

With all of this other work out of the way, the group was able to finally set the Safe Zone plan into action.

Barry said he expects the letters to go out to the faculty next week, and students can expect the bookmarks to be posted in November.

management, the cost will probably just be absorbed."

The installation of a secondary back-up system that might serve to prevent future outages would be cost prohibitive, Smith said.

The repairs were expected to take until early this morning.

"Part of the problem is that it's difficult to determine which strands go to which buildings," Ramsey said.

To identify the cable, repairmen went to the buildings and shined a laser through the fiber to match up the new fiber with the old, Smith said.

Students using labs in the affected buildings were unable to complete projects and homework.

"A lot of students have flocked to Nichols and are waiting for (personal computers)," Ramsey said.

"The server that the public CNS labs use inside Nichols will allow the (personal computers) to talk to others inside Nichols."

This is the first cable cut since the campus network was installed in 1988. The wires, which connect the phones and computers on campus, cost about $6 million to install, Smith said.

She said she wanted to know why the city cleaned the neighborhood up through the urban renewal project if it was going to be subjected to hazardous waste.

City commissioner Bruce Snead said there is a lot of speculation concerning the proposal and that no one should speculate what the county is doing before talking with the county commission.

City commissioner Sydney Carlin said she doesn't know why Howie's wasn't located in the industrial park in the first place.

Rhodesman said the neighborhood association invited McCulloh to the meeting, but she declined the invitation because she said she wanted to speak to the other counties that would be involved in the project before talking with the neighborhood association.

"It's one more thing this neighborhood has to battle, and hey, we're not going away," Bloomberg-Ellis said. McCulloh said the county is still in the planning stages of the project.

"I'm sorry they're feeling that we didn't inform them of our actions," she said.

She said the county plans to attend the neighborhood associations meeting in November when they hope to have had the plan completed.

McCulloh said public comments are important in this proposal, but Riley County commissioners wanted to talk to each of the counties before talking with the public.

In other business, the city is still trying to hire an auditing firm to trace the financial history of the Rehabilitation Loan Trust Fund.

The association requested an audit be done on the fund at a city commission meeting Sept. 5.

The city commission did not meet its Sept. 20 deadline to hire an auditor to trace financial history of the fund. No firms applied for the project by the deadline.

The fund contains money from sales of land through the urban renewal program. The fund is supposed to be spent to assist projects and services in low to moderate income areas in the city.

Some members of the association argued the fund should have been spent in their neighborhood because a lot of the land sold was in the south Manhattan area.

The allocations being questioned date back to the 1980s. The audit will cost about $12,000.

The commission set a date for a pre-proposal meeting for 7 p.m. Nov. 6 at the Douglas Center Annex.

Advertisements of the pre-proposal meeting will be published in six Kansas newspapers.

At the pre-proposal meeting, auditing firms who want to bid for the audit will give city commissioners their bids.

Manhattan Economic Development Opportunity Fund Advisory Board, Pottawatomie, Riley county officials and other interested parties.

"I can't say what the incentives will be at this time," Martin said, "but I can say the incentives will be similar to the initial ones provided for the electric-vehicle plant."

TDM will require more land at the site of the electric-vehicle plant to add the natural-gas conversion plant. The size of the facility could increase from 40,000 to 60,000 square feet, Martin said. TDM's commitment to convert combustion-engine vehicles to natural-gas powered vehicles will generate about $250 million in economic activity for the automobile industry, said Wade Graves, manager of research and development and technical development for Western Resource.

"Many fleets within the state will be converted in 1996 to alternatively fueled vehicles," Graves said.

The U.S. military, United Parcel Service, Federal Express and U.S. Postal Service all have vehicle fleets.

"By the year 2003, 70 percent of all fleet vehicles must be alternatively fueled," Graves said. "This facility will be the single most important hub for producing alternative-fueled vehicles in the U.S."

A natural-gas vehicle conversion plant in Manhattan could create even more spin-off jobs and re-location of more businesses near Manhattan, Graves said.

"The city has the opportunity to contact suppliers of parts for alternatively fueled vehicles to be close to the Manhattan facility here in Kansas," Hague said.

Martin said this is an excellent opportunity for Manhattan.

"I think the public will be very comfortable with this," he said.

BIKES

Since January, Grice said 34 bicycles have been reported stolen to the University, including a bike worth $1,400.

In addition, bicycles registered through the University can also be returned if they are found by the Riley County Police Department, Grice said.

Last year, Grice said the RCPD was unable to return 100 to 200 bicycles because it was unsure to whom the bicycles belonged.

"Bicycle registration will enable police to start tracing bicycles back," Grice said.

Although students will be able to get the ticket for not registering their bicycles waived, they still will have to deal with the trouble of having a chain lock removed from their bikes if they are caught breaking a bicycle regulation.

Grice said locking up a bike without a permit is the only viable way to enforce the regulation.

"The only thing to do is lock it up," Grice said. "We don't know who the owner is. An officer can't sit there and watch the bike until the owner comes out to it."

Grice said bicyclists can have chain locks removed 24 hours a day. If Parking Services is closed, the ticket can be taken care of at the campus police station.

To determine the number of registered bicycles in proportion to the number of bicycles on campus, Grice said the campus police did an informal survey last week between the hours of midnight and 5 a.m.

Two hundred eighty-one bicycles were parked in the bicycle racks outside Derby Dining Center, and 13 were registered. Sixty-six bikes were parked in the bicycle racks outside Goodnow Hall, and 12 were registered.

Eighty-five were parked in the bicycle racks outside Marlatt Hall, and 14 were registered.

SENATE

amendment that increased the allocation for the rent of space from $500 to $1,000 for the Native American Student Body's Pow Wow.

"The committee did this because we have funded them $1,000 in the past," Avila said.

Avila proposed the amendment because Senate's informal funding guidelines prohibit allocations for rent of space from exceeding $500.

When the informal guidelines were presented by Allocations Committee, it anticipated suspending the guidelines to increase this and another group's allocations when they came up on the floor.

The amendment passed, and the total allocation was $3,172.50.

Students Advocating a Valid Education received $556.90 for a speaker.

The Bangladesh Students Association received $855.30 for a speaker and a Bengali film festival.

The India Student Association was allocated $2,195.70 for the spring festival and a performance.

The International Club will receive $1,421.30 for Cultural Night, a spring film festival and a spring dance celebration.

The final allocation was for the Muslim Student Association. The association received $1,403.80 for two lectures. An allocation for $260 to the Secret Masters of Fandom was referred back to the Allocations Committee.

Bill Muir, faculty senator, moved to send the allocation back to committee until better information concerning the Vampire Live-Action Role Playing could be brought forward. An allocation of $117.50 was recommended for the role-playing event.

Two resolutions opposed to cuts in financial aid on the state and federal levels were given first readings.

The Privilege Fee Committee presented a bill that would continue to fund Bramlage Coliseum at the rate of $1 for full-time students per semester and 50 cents for part-time students. The bill will be voted on next week.

Allocations for the Pakistan Student Association, the Society for Appreciation of Bharatiya Heritage and Arts, the Thai Student Organization and the Chinese and Taiwanese Student Association received first readings. Total allocations would be $2,900.70.

Special allocations for three organizations for a total of $1,822.20 were presented for first readings.

The Thai Student Organization requested an allocation for its cultural night. Blue Key Honor Fraternity requested funds for the group's Leadership Week in November. The National Black Pan-Hellenic Council also requested funds to attend a conference.

The final bill up for first readings defined at-large members. An at-large member is described as any K-State student who is not serving in an appointed or elected position in the judicial, executive or legislative branches of the Student Governing Association.

The definition would be put in the SGA by-laws if passed.

► OKLAHOMA CITY BOMBING

Delegation supports victims

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Janet Reno joined Oklahoma's congressional delegation on the six-month anniversary of the Oklahoma City bombing Thursday to pay tribute to the victims and rescue workers.

Reno said she was still impressed with the strength, courage and magnificent spirit of the people of Oklahoma in coping with the bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building.

The April 19 explosion killed 169 people and injured more than 500.

"Six months ago today, we had the one of the worst tragedies that has ever happened in the United States," Sen. Don Nickles, R-Okla., said. "We want to thank the American people, because Americans all across the country united and their work turned this tragedy into an overwhelming show of love and support."

Twenty-six toddlers from Temple Sinai Nursery School in Washington sang a Hebrew song called "Hello Friends" at the start of the ceremony, which was organized by B'nai B'rith International, one of several service groups that collected donations for victims of the blast.

The group gave Nickles a symbolic check representing $515,000 in donations. The money came from more than 10,000 contributors, Tommy Baer, the group's president, said. The explosion marked a turning point in American history, Baer said.

"Although the site is now quiet, echoes of that terrible, terrible moment still reverberate," he said. "Before this event, we had the luxury of believing that no matter how radical our enemies, we could look into the eyes of our fellow Americans and see a friend, an ally. No longer."

About $350,000 of the money will go to the Oklahoma City Community Foundation to help provide counseling, financial help and scholarships to families of the victims.

Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., praised the attorney general's efforts to catch and prosecute the bombers, saying he was confident that Reno would keep on keeping on until the perpetrators are brought to justice.

Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols are charged with murder and conspiracy in connection with the bombing.

Baer called on the House to pass an anti-terrorism bill that already has been passed by the Senate. The bill will give law enforcement the tools they need to combat the threat of terrorism, he said.

Eastwood wins lawsuit against National Enquirer

■ Tabloid executives deny falsifying interview

Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — A federal jury made Dirty Harry's day Thursday, ordering the National Enquirer to pay Clint Eastwood $150,000 in damages for running what he said was a made-up interview.

"It's important to stand up when there's no element of truth," Eastwood said after the verdict was rendered.

"If I let it slide, the Enquirer will just continue doing it. I almost have to do it to get them to behave," Eastwood said.

The "Dirty Harry" actor said that a so-called exclusive interview published Dec. 21, 1993, and headlined "Dirty Harry Lifts the Lid on His Private Life" never took place.

The tabloid's executives testified that the interview did occur. Eastwood sued for commercial misappropriation and misrepresentation.

His lawyer said he was entitled to the more-than $1 million in profits the Enquirer made on the issue and an additional sum for damage to his reputation.

Gerson Zweifach, an attorney for the Lantana, Fla.-based Enquirer, said that he will appeal the verdict and is confident the tabloid will prevail.

Among the highlights of the interview now deemed bogus:

■ On raising a daughter, Eastwood was quoted as saying it isn't what he had planned to be doing at that particular stage in his life, but what the hell. It's better than sitting around getting fat and lazy.

■ On proposing marriage to actress Frances Fisher, mother of Eastwood's child: "Sometimes she says yes and sometimes she says no, so we never really get around to getting married."

■ On Eastwood's movie roles: "I can't keep playing someone else's idea of a tough guy."

Eastwood said he will give the money to charity.

The lawsuit was a personal stance to speak the truth.

"I'll own up to anything that's true," Eastwood said.

Students vent their emotions while watching the K-State vs. Nebraska football game Saturday afternoon at Scoreboard in Aggieville. Although the game started out close with a 6-7 score, Nebraska eventually won the game, 49-25.

Wildcat faithful

About 100 people attended a pep rally Friday to send off the K-State football team as it headed to Lincoln, Neb., to take on the Nebraska Cornhuskers.

Students, alumni, children and parents cheered as the team walked by and onto the buses. Members of the K-State Marching Band played the fight song and other songs like "Eat 'em up. Eat 'em up, KSU."

Spirits were high as the team left for Memorial Stadium to attempt to break a 26-game losing streak against the Huskers.

"I love football. We haven't beaten Nebraska in so long that I wanted to come out and support the team," Blaine Voth, junior in business administration, said.

Voth said he has a sister who is a K-State fan and a brother who is a Nebraska fan. He said he was planning on going to the game, but he heard tickets were selling for $150 each so he opted to stay home and watch the game on television.

Justin Webb, freshman in accounting, was another fan who came out to support the Cats but wasn't going to Lincoln.

"I heard about the pep rally on the radio, and I wanted to come support the Cats," Webb said.

Some students who were traveling to Lincoln also came out to support the team before it left.

"I came out to support the team and to give them confidence for the game," Todd Morrison, senior in agribusiness, said.

Morrison said he thought the Cats would win if the defense played well. He said he was traveling to Lincoln with Sally Larson, sophomore in business administration, who also attended the pep rally.

Winning was on the mind of everybody who attended the pep rally.

"I'm pumped up," Tom Clayton, senior in electrical engineering, said. "I think we can win."

Clayton said he wasn't going to the game but he was going to watch it on television.

Several players stopped to sign autographs for fans as they boarded the bus. The fight song was playing as the three buses drove away, and the football team began its quest for a victory in Lincoln.

K-State fans remain loyal despite drowning in a sea of Husker red stories by Chris May

An impressive sea of red and a spot of purple.

That summed up what most people thought of the atmosphere at Memorial Stadium in Lincoln, Neb., Saturday as the Cornhuskers beat the K-State Wildcats 49-25.

At least that's what the people on the Union Program Council bus thought.

Forty-two K-State fans started their trip to Lincoln Friday in hopes of a Wildcat victory. They arrived in Lincoln around 8 p.m. and had the whole night to themselves.

"I enjoyed the bars and meeting with the Nebraska people," said Jon Herrick, sophomore in animal sciences and industry. "They treated us really well. In fact, they even played the fight song for us."

Herrick said he was treated well in downtown Lincoln on game day as well.

"They are very good hosts," Herrick said.

Herrick, a native Nebraskan, entered the stadium for the first time in his life not wearing red.

It wasn't just outside the stadium that the Huskers were treating the Cats with respect. They even did it inside the stadium, Jeff Gibbons, graduate student in psychology, said.

"We were treated well, and the bars were very nice. I went to the Big Red Keno, and the Husker fans were pretty cool. We got them to play the fight song, and their fans didn't give us too hard of a time," Gibbons said.

Besides the nice bars in town, the main attraction was the atmosphere in Memorial Stadium.

"All that red was very impressive," Becca Stith, sophomore in secondary education, said.

Stith said she was just happy she got to go to the game.

"It was a great opportunity to see Nebraska's stadium and to support the Cats," Stith said.

She said she plans on making the trip to Ames, Iowa, in three weeks to see K-State take on Iowa State.

"Walking into the game, I thought it was a real intense atmosphere. That's what college football is all about," said Casey Kershner, junior in pre-law and public relations.

"I hope they don't let this game get to them, because they have the rest of the season, and we will beat KU next week."

The Cats played to win, and they played hard, Kershner said. He said he was happy he made the trip.

The UPC trip was sold out the first 15 minutes, said Angie Riggs, junior in management and vice-president of UPC membership. Riggs said she also plans to attend the game in Ames to support the Cats.

Students who went on the UPC trip to Lincoln seemed happy they went despite the Cats' loss.

"It was a really fun trip," Kari Henke, sophomore in pre-nursing, said.

"Seeing all the red in that huge stadium, it was amazing. I was glad I got to sit with the KSU students."

STUDENT SENATE

A&S senator could face impeachment

Cristina Janney
city-government editor

Student Senate Operations Committee will be considering the impeachment of a senator at its meeting tonight.

A hearing on the possible impeachment of Michael Henry, arts and sciences senator, for excessive absences will be on the committee's agenda.

John Potter, Senate chair, said Henry has three unexcused absences from Senate meetings. Having three or more unexcused absences from Senate is grounds for impeachment under Senate standing rules.

The Senate chair is responsible for determining what absences are excused. Potter said he will excuse senators from meetings because of classes, tests, illnesses, deaths of family members or other family emergencies.

Study sessions, social functions or trips are not grounds for excused absences, Potter said.

"This is nothing against him personally," Potter said. "He hasn't been following the rules."

Potter said Henry missed one of the first Senate meetings of the term in April, the Senate retreat and a Senate allocations meeting Tuesday.

None of the absences were excused, Potter said. Henry said he thought Potter had been fair with his attendance policy, but from year to year, there has been no consistent policy of what constituted excused absences.

He said he missed the meeting in April because of a fraternity ceremony. He said he was a new member of the fraternity, and he thought it was important to attend the function.

"The absence was my fault," Henry said, "but I wasn't slacking. There was no business of concern to students being considered, just the by-laws."

REVIEW

Jazz legend still swinging at 75 years old

J. Scot
staff reporter

The audience had bobbing heads, twitching shoulders and tapping feet. This was not an audience full of people having seizures; rather, the people were experiencing and enjoying the music of the Clark Terry Quintet.

Terry was introduced as a living legend, a lover of music and a music educator Saturday evening at McCain Auditorium.

At 75 years old, Terry could still keep up with the best of them in the world of jazz musicians.

He might be viewed as a legend, but when it comes to the stage, he shares the spotlight with his co-performers openly and equally.

The atmosphere was both relaxing and inspiring. The stage was set with a grand piano, an alto saxophone, a drum set, an upright bass, a trumpet and flugelhorn.

One of the songs played was written by an old friend of Terry's who lives in Wichita, Gary Fletcher. The song is titled "The Snapper."

The saxophone and piano solo was so impressive and soothing stress levels could just float away.

Terry said he had hoped he could do justice to the song, and he definitely did.

"Samba de Gums" was one of the highlights of the show, during which the audience and jazz band had collaborated to pay a birthday tribute to Terry, who turned 75 this year.

During this song, the lights came up, and the audience stood to sing happy birthday to Terry. When the tempo of the K-State Concert Jazz Ensemble suddenly changed into the tune of "Happy Birthday," Terry's eyes widened, and he jumped to his feet.

Dennis Wilson, assistant professor of music and director of jazz studies, presented Terry with a K-State sweatshirt and power cat lapel pin.

"Maybe if I would have had this stuff earlier today, we could have beaten Nebraska," Terry said.

When they did finally play the song, it featured a Latin-flavored beat interpreted by the American jazz culture.

It was a saucy, sassy, soulful rhythmic piece, which had people in the audience dancing in their seats. Toward the middle of the song, the melody slowed to give it a romantic, love-making appeal.

Another song performed was the theme to Terry's favorite comedy show, "The Flintstones," it was the jazz version.

Other songs performed were just as uplifting and

GOODNOW HALL

Residents learn responsible drinking

Katie Thomas
staff reporter

More than 85 Goodnow Hall residents gathered at TW Longhorn's to learn about alcohol Sunday night.

"There was a need to educate our residents on responsible drinking," Nikki Thompson, senior in animal sciences and industry, said. Thompson was one of the co-coordinators of the hall program.

Signs that said "Come Drink with Staff and the Hall Governing Board" advertised the program and drew the large crowd, Jamie Vandapool, junior in secondary education, said.

"As a staff, we are always looking for ways to educate our residents," Nikki Ingalls, junior in elementary education, said. Ingalls was the other co-coordinator of the program.

The program's goal was to address the use, misuse and abuse of alcohol, said Mateo Remsburg, graduate student in student counseling and personal services.

"There are a lot of myths out there," he said.

► BLIND MELON LEAD SINGER FOUND DEAD; CAUSE OF DEATH UNKNOWN

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — Shannon Hoon, whose smooth, high-pitched vocals took the rock group Blind Melon to the top of the charts with its eclectic 1993 debut hit "No Rain," died Saturday. He was 28.

Hoon was found dead on his tour bus about 1:30 p.m. His sound manager apparently couldn't wake him and called police, Sgt. Marlon DeFillo said. He said there was no sign of trauma, and the cause of death remains unclassified pending an autopsy.

The coroner's office in New Orleans confirmed receipt of Hoon's body but would not comment further. A security guard at Capitol Records, the band's label in Los Angeles, said no one was available to comment.

Blind Melon was in New Orleans to play at the famed Tipitina's music club. The tour bus was in a parking lot on St. Charles Ave. near where the group recorded its second album, "Soup," in the city's warehouse district.

The band played Friday night in Houston.

Hoon, born Richard Shannon

Hoon in Lafayette, Ind., experienced both personal and professional turmoil as his band gained fame.

In October 1993, Hoon faced nudity and indecent exposure charges after he stripped and urinated onstage during a concert in Vancouver, British Columbia. He was also charged for attacking a security guard during the taping of the American Music Awards in February 1994.

There were mixed reviews of Blind Melon's appearance at Woodstock '94, and Hoon was arrested for drunk and disorderly conduct in New Orleans during the recording of "Soup."

Last month, Hoon said he began going through a period of intense self-evaluation after learning his girlfriend Lisa was pregnant.

"I need to start caring about myself if I'm going to be the proper father," Hoon said.

Hoon

Hoon told the Indianapolis Star last month he had straightened himself out and wanted to get a motor home to tour with his girlfriend and their 4-month-old daughter Nika Blue.

His mother, Nel, told Rolling Stone magazine in an interview that, at one point, she was carrying four bail bonds for Hoon.

"When he got into drugs, I just gave up hope," she said. "He just turned 26, and there were times I didn't think he'd live that long."

Hoon came from the same hometown as Axl Rose of the group Guns N' Roses, which toured with Blind Melon and helped the group early on. Hoon sang backing vocals on the Guns song "Don't Cry," and his appearance as a man in plaid in the video helped create a buzz for the Melons.

When the group's first album was released in September 1992, sales remained stagnant until MTV began airing the video for "No Rain" nine months later. The video, which featured a 10-year-old actress cavorting in a bee costume to Hoon's vocals, became the group's signature.

► ASHES IGNITE COMPOST PILE, BURN LOCAL GARAGE TO THE GROUND

A fire at 360 16th St. burned a garage and its contents to the ground Saturday.

Rick Berry, battalion chief for the Manhattan Fire Department, said the fire was started when fireplace ashes were disposed of on a compost pile. The ashes ignited some leaves or other material and spread to the garage, he said.

"We got the first call at 5:15 p.m., which was reported as a leaf fire. Then the second call came in at 5:17 p.m., and it was reported as a garage on fire," Berry said.

When the fire department arrived at the scene of the fire, the garage was fully engulfed in flames.

Carla Hamilton, a Manhattan High School student, said she was vacuuming her mother's car when she saw the flames coming from the garage.

"I ran in the house to my mom, and she called 911," she said.

Darlene Cornia, Manhattan resident, said she saw the flames reflecting off of her window.

"I went outside to see what was on fire and saw the garage across the street was in flames," she said.

The fire department had the fire under control in a matter of minutes, Berry said.

"The fire was pretty well isolated," he said.

Berry said the fire was classified as an accidental, unintentional fire, and no charges will be filed against the owner.

The estimated loss of the garage and its contents is about $6,000, Berry said.

The owner was at home at the time of the fire but declined to comment.

■ Fraternity dedicates plaque to Hollis House

Jamie Willey
staff reporter

A plaque was dedicated to the Alpha Tau Omega's old chapter house and placed in the west foyer of Throckmorton Hall Saturday.

ATO members and alumni and K-State administrators met at Throckmorton to receive the plaque, recall old memories and pay tribute to the Hollis House.

The Hollis House was originally located where Throckmorton Hall is now. Previously, it was the ATO's old chapter house before the building was sold to the University in 1970 and named after James Hollis, a University benefactor.

Bill Muir, K-State's ATO chapter sponsor, said the Hollis House, the building that housed the KSU Alumni Association and the KSU Foundation was torn down about two years ago for Throckmorton expansion.

David Mugler, associate dean of the College of Agriculture, said he remembered the Hollis House being used as a chapter house while he was attending K-State.

"I think the plaque is very good. It will help those memories live on," Mugler said.

Muir said he had a lot of fond memories about the Hollis House.

"It was our home. I lived here for four years. It is kind of nostalgic to stand here where so many fun things happened, so many crazy things and some studying things," Muir said.

Muir said he had been thinking of placing a plaque in Throckmorton since the house was torn down, but he decided to wait until this weekend to unveil the plaque because it was ATO's 75th anniversary.

"I got with folks at the KSU Foundation and said there ought to be a way to remember the Hollis House," Muir said.

Muir said ATO bought the house in 1947 and added a wing to it in 1955.

He said the fraternity lived in the house until it was sold in 1970 to the University.

Gordon Dowell, director of communications for the KSU Foundation, said the Foundation was operating out of a back hallway office in Anderson Hall and needed more space as the organization grew.

As a result of this, the organization moved into the Hollis House.

"It's great to pay tribute to the place and to the family. They are both deserving of the recognition," Dowell said.

After the building was destroyed, the Foundation and Alumni Association moved to a new building, where the Foundation named its telefund center the Hollis Telefund Center.

"The Foundation's telefund brings a lot of money and prestige to K-State. Applying Hollis' name carries with it a great deal of prestige also," Dowell said.

Muir said that even though the Hollis House held sentimental value for him, he wasn't too upset when it was torn down.

"It was in the way, while it was a neat limestone structure, it wasn't one of any significance. But that doesn't mean we can't remember it," Muir said.

Dan Dow, ATO chapter president; Gary Hellebust, executive vice-president of KSU Foundation; Brian Ruyle, ATO national president; Marc Johnson, dean of the College of Agriculture, and Steve Johnston, president of ATO building corporation, were all in attendance at the dedication of the plaque.

"Twenty-five years ago this month we were opening the new chapter house and saying goodbye to this chapter house, and now it's not even here," Muir said.

I lived here for four years. It is kind of nostalgic to stand here where so many fun things happened, so many crazy things and some studying things.

Moms kidnapped for philanthropy

J. Scot
staff reporter

It was kidnapping for a cause, with a limousine as a getaway car.

Lambda Chi Alpha fraternity imprisoned sorority and fraternity housemothers and officers Friday in conjunction with its third-annual North American Food Drive.

"This event takes place across the U.S. and Canada. We hope to raise 500,000 pounds for local charities," said Kevin O'Neill, director of chapter services at Lambda Chi's national headquarters.

The NAFFD is a chance for local chapters to collect canned goods for a local charity, he said.

"Chapters can collect nonperishable food prior to or on Nov. 4, which is the final day for collection. Then all chapters will call the national office and report how much they have collected," he said.

The food drive is the biggest philanthropy sponsored by any fraternity, O'Neill said.

The Lambda Chi national fraternity has set goals based on the size of each individual chapter. The K-State chapter's official goal is 4,000 pounds, said Casey Musil, senior in management and Lambda Chi external vice president.

This is the chapter's first year to participate, and its goal is to be recognized for its efforts, Musil said.

"If we get half of our goal, then it will have been a success for us," he said.

Musil said all the food and money the Lambda Chi collect will go to the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

The Lambda Chis rented a limousine to transport the hostages, he said. "We took pictures of us with the hostage, then left it and a ransom note at the houses," he said.

The Lambda Chis fed their hostages dinner and entertained them, and then they took them home, he said.

"During this time, we were waiting for the ransom money," he said.

Eleven K-State houses participated in the philanthropy, and each house raised $35 to have its hostage returned, Musil said.

Edna Rush, Alpha Chi Omega housemother, was kidnapped and said she thought the philanthropy was great.

"I do not know why the other houses were not involved. They missed out," she said.

Sigma Chi's housemother, Vicki Morgan, said the philanthropy was fun and the Lambda Chis treated all the hostages well.

"It is not every day you get kidnapped in a limousine. This was definitely different — that was why we wanted to participate," she said.

Amy Vaughan, senior in marketing and advertising and president of Alpha Delta Pi, said she had a good time being kidnapped and was glad to see that the money was going toward a good cause.

"We enjoy supporting other houses' philanthropies," she said.

The Lambda Chis want this to become an annual event at K-State, Musil said.

"This is all for a great cause," he said. "As a fraternity, with community support, we are feeding the needy."

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — A 27-year-old Independence man has been charged with sexually assaulting three boys.

Michael J. Finnegan was charged Friday with four counts of first-degree statutory sodomy. Each charge carries a penalty of 10 years to life in prison.

According to court records, a man last week approached the boys as they played. The man asked if they had seen his dog.

The boys took the man to a tunnel leading to a park. The man then grabbed a large stick and forced each to perform a sexual act on him.

Rent obligations belong to mall, not taxpayers

If the city refinances the bonds, Forest City would only lose the last free year. It would still save $1.1 million.

Don't you wish the city would pay your rent?
If you lived in the Manhattan Town Center, it just might.

The mall, however, might lose its free rent. The city commission is considering refinancing industrial revenue bonds and changing the deal that goes with them for the mall.

During a meeting with the city on Thursday, Forest City, the company that manages the Manhattan mall and 20 other malls, said refinancing the bonds would save it $1.3 million because of lower interest rates.

Of course, the city is already giving Forest City a free ride on its rent. The city waved the $185,000-per-year rent in 1992. Forest City was allowed to slide for five years because they were in financial trouble.

That move has freed $740,000 of Forest City's money. But now that Forest City wants to refinance, city officials are considering making it cough up its rent.

It's a good idea.

If the city refinances the bonds, Forest City would only lose the last free year. It would still save $1.1 million.

The argument is that the bond holder could foreclose on the mall if the city doesn't continue to help Forest City. And the mall makes tax money for the city and is worth the investment. It's supposed to be a win-win situation.

But many businesses make tax money for the city. They also pay their own rent.

It doesn't make sense to allow more free milk. Forest City can afford it.

And if they can't, they shouldn't be in the business of losing taxpayer money.

If the laws are not changed, then

Sodomy equals civil disobedience

So, the "Reverend" Fred Phelps thinks I should be arrested?

You know what?
He's right.

By all rights, I SHOULD be arrested. At least, if we lived in a culture that had any respect for the law.

But we don't.
We live in a society that likes to pass puritanical laws regarding personal morality that are rarely, if ever, enforced — laws people like me break with impunity, laughing in the face of a legal system that encourages disrespect for itself.

I am a criminal, and I readily admit it.

As the "good reverend" pointed out on "A Purple Affair" last week, same-gender sodomy is illegal in Kansas, and I have admitted — no, make that BRAGGED — in this column that I have intentionally and willfully violated KSA 21-3505 on several occasions.

For those of you who don't know, KSA 21-3505 is the Kansas sodomy statute, which defines sexual contact between members of the same sex as a class B misdemeanor.

Contrary to what many people think, this law does not apply to opposite-sex sexual contact.

Kansas is one of the few states that have such laws — most states with sodomy laws apply that law to both straight and queer sex.

What this means is a woman who performs oral sex on her boyfriend isn't breaking this law, but if a man does the same thing, he is a criminal.

This is, of course, discrimination on the basis of gender.

Unfortunately, neither Kansas nor the United States have laws that prohibit this kind of gender discrimination.

The Equal Rights Amendment didn't pass, remember?

But more than the issue of gender discrimination, KSA 21-3505 is also a clear violation of the 14th Amendment to the U.S.

Constitution, which prohibits laws from being passed that single out one group of people — in this case, queers — without applying the law to everyone else.

It is this principle of prohibiting laws that don't apply equally that will probably be the downfall of this hateful statute.

My rationale for this conclusion is based on the precedent set by Commonwealth of Kentucky v. Wasson in 1992. Kentucky, until that time, had a sodomy law almost identical to Kansas, criminalizing only same-gender sexual contact.

The law was successfully challenged under the equal-protection clause and overturned by the Kentucky Supreme Court.

Kentucky no longer has a sodomy law because someone had the courage to stand up and challenge it in court. There is every reason to believe that the same would happen here in Kansas.

And I am willing to challenge Kansas' sodomy law. Hence, my "bragging" about being a criminal — I laugh in the face of the law and the state legislature because I know that this unjust law cannot be enforced.

And if some misguided prosecutor attempted to try me for my "crime," I would fight it. And I would win.

But I really don't think that would happen because I know what this law is really on the books for — not to be enforced or prosecuted because it is clearly a vulnerable law if challenged.

No, this law is on the books to intimidate, to send a message to queers in Kansas that they are not wanted and they don't deserve to be treated equally.

The law is there to justify labeling queers as criminals and therefore unworthy of equal treatment and respect.

So as the good "reverend" pointed out last week, I am indeed guilty of criminal conduct. I don't want to be a criminal, but I willfully flaunt that conduct in this column, daring the law to arrest me for it.

Call it civil disobedience.

I am practically begging to be arrested. But somehow, I just don't think it's going to happen.

Mother's birthday brings family together

Families are very interesting to watch, especially their interactions. This past weekend, my family had a reunion in Kansas City to celebrate my mother's birthday. I am the youngest of four children, which might not sound too unusual, but the age difference between my oldest sister and myself is quite unusual.

I was born less than a month before my sister, Kim, graduated from high school. Kathy is two years younger than Kim, and Geoff is five years older than me. Our family is really broken up into two different age groups: the 30-something (getting close to the 40-something) and the Generation X. I feel at times that my sisters still think of me as the 3-year-old they took care of during their semester break from college.

It was interesting to see my sisters without their sons. This was the first weekend we have been together as a family without any of my nephews since my oldest nephew was born. I have 4 nephews ranging in age from four to 11. It is hard to believe my nephew, Friedrich, will be 11 next month.

It kind of makes me feel old.
Being the youngest has its advantages and disadvantages. The biggest advantage is to see my siblings' mistakes. I have seen the pain that they have been through, and I hope, I will not go through the same experiences such as divorce and problem relationships.

The biggest disadvantage of being the youngest is that my siblings feel that I am my parents' favorite. I feel that my parents have made every effort to not show favoritism toward any of us. But birth order has made an effect on the opportunities available to me. My favorite saying to my sister is, "You got their youth; I got their money."

It is fun to have the nephews around during holidays; there's always something to put together or fix. I often wonder if my children will have the opportunities to know and spend time with my parents as my nephews have done. That is when the age difference will come into play.

My mother is the real glue that keeps our family together. If it were not for my mother, I don't think I would know the happenings of the siblings and their families. She is our family's communication channel.

My parents have raised four very different individuals, which is great.

SCOTT SMITH

We all have gone our separate ways and moved to different parts of the country, but we all have a common bond. I believe we all love and care about one another. I hope we never lose that, even after our parents are gone.

Our parents have gone above and beyond for each one of us. I don't think we've really appreciated what they have done for us.

It will be interesting to see how our family grows and changes as time goes on, but I hope we never lose our bond.

I thank my mother for planning this event; it will be remembered by me for years to come. Next time, maybe we (the kids) will plan it. I can't thank her enough for all what she has done for us.

Happy Birthday, Mom!

Scott Smith is a senior in agriculture economics.

HEALTH FAIR THANKS

Editor,

We want to publicly thank all the student volunteers who helped at the Health Professional School Fair Oct. 12.

You received lavish praise from many school representatives who commented on your interest, courtesy and helpfulness.

This reflects well not only on you as individuals, but on K-State pre-health students and the K-State community in general.

We could not have pulled off such a wonderful event (67 programs and more than 500 students) without you.

Special thanks go to Angie Dixon and Dene Sawyers, who scheduled, notified and supervised all student volunteers, and Alex DeBaun, Natalie Lehman and the dean's office staff, who spent many hours helping us to prepare for the fair.

Thank you to the many faculty who made announcements in class that resulted in such a fine student turnout.

VISITOR PARKING

Editor,

K-State may not achieve the national championship in football this year, but it certainly ranks No. 1 in idiocy.

Take parking, for example.

Because of campus construction, we've been told that parking is at a premium.

So, those of us with "hunting licenses" (a.k.a. parking permits) need to worry a bit more about finding a space in a campus lot.

I can deal with this. Campus improvements are a fact of life (except, of course, for Seaton Hall).

What I find utterly stupid is to find portions of the West Stadium lot blocked off for conference parking and the tractor-trailers of America's pandering corporations that display their wares in the Union free-speech zone.

And then there are the dreaded school buses.

Further, and to my dismay, some conferees are provided with shuttle service from the parking lot to their on-campus destination.

In the meantime, we permit-holders, finding our spaces taken up by these "visitors," must park on the street at some distance from campus.

No shuttle service for us. Whether these "guests" pay to park is irrelevant. I already have paid good money for a campus parking permit and only expect to compete with other permit-holders for a limited number of spaces.

I did not pay to park on the street.

In the meantime, the sacred K-State stadium lots remain empty.

So, here's a suggestion from a low-salaried faculty member to a big-buck administrator (who probably holds a 24-hour reserved space).

Have these "visitors" park in the K-State Stadium lot and provide shuttle service (which you do already) for them.

Don't deny the permit-holders the service they paid for.

THANKS FOR ELDERS

Editor,

We would like to thank the groups responsible for bringing former U.S. Surgeon General Joycelyn Elders to speak at the Lou Douglas lecture.

Her message of the importance of education and prevention in the health-care industry is very important to us in the Health Education and Promotion Department at Lafene Health Center.

During this time of budgetary cutbacks, we want students to make informed choices about issues that may affect their future.

If funding for Lafene is cut or not increased, some services, like health education, may be eliminated.

Thus, we recommend that students talk to their senators from their individual colleges.

As Elders said, health education and prevention are our best tools to cut health-care costs and keeping our students healthy.

Comprehensive, quality patient care, for example, "total patient care," should incorporate both knowledge of health-care maintenance and preventive behaviors through education, along with traditional health-care practice.

Lafene Health Center offers professional educational programs to individuals and groups to meet these needs.

We feel these services are valuable tools for our students and their health and wellness while at K-State.

NU option runs over Wildcat
defenseDan Lewerenz
sports editor

Lincoln, Neb. — What happens when the nation's best defense runs into the nation's best offense?

K-State entered Lincoln's Memorial Stadium with the nation's most effective scoring defense. The Wildcats previously had their opponents only 94.8 rushing yards per game, making the Cats No. 8 nationally against the run.

But none of that mattered Saturday. The Cats were simply unable to stop the nation's best offense, watching Nebraska rush for 139 yards in the first half alone.

"I don't think we've faced a running team the caliber of Nebraska," Coach Bill Snyder said. "They're the best running team we've played this year."

Though well under Nebraska's average, the Cornhuskers' 190 rushing yards were enough to run over a tough Wildcat defense.

The Huskers were led by true freshman Ahman Green's 109 yards on 22 carries. Green also racked up 41 receiving yards, including two touchdowns.

"You certainly can't take anything away from him," cornerback Gordon Brown said. "He's a great back, and Nebraska's got a great running game."

Most of Green's yardage was set up by Nebraska's option offense, run almost to perfection by senior quarterback Tommie Frazier.

"You've got to be careful with their option, especially with Tommie Frazier back there," linebacker Percell Gaskins said. "You just can't make any mistakes against a national-championship football team, and we made mistakes."

"We goofed up about as much as you can goof up in the first half, and they capitalized on it. Before we knew it, the score was 35-6."

It was those mistakes on defense — missed assignments, blown tackles and busted coverages — and the solid execution by the Huskers that cost the Cats the game.

"Their execution is so good," defensive tackle Tim Colston said. "The nemesis for us was we couldn't be assignment-sound all the time."

"We had a lot of assignments blown, and in some instances it was as simple as missed tackles."

We goofed up about as much as you can goof up in the first half, and they capitalized on it.

PERCELL GASKINS
K-STATE LINEBACKER

The success of Nebraska's running game opened up the Wildcat defense to the Husker passing attack. Nebraska threw for 148 yards, highlighted by a 32-yard touchdown pass from Frazier to a wide-open Jon Vedral.

"We had to really watch out for their running game and the option," Brown said. "And I guess when we really got down on the running game, it opened up the passing game a little bit. We just didn't play as sound as we're used to — and we gave up more yards than we would like to in any game."

Strong safety Mario Smith agreed, saying that mental errors were responsible for the Wildcats' uncharacteristic weakness in the backfield.

"The option did open it up to an extent, but it was basically mental errors on our part," Smith said.

"We just made too many mistakes, and Nebraska capitalized on them."

Though the numbers on the scoreboard determine who wins and loses, the more important numbers for the Cats might be on the stat sheet. The Huskers' 338 yards of total offense were a season low, 137 yards under their previous low against Missouri. And the Nebraska running game that dominated the first half was still 162 yards below the Huskers' season average.

"We didn't run the ball quite as well as I'd have liked to," Nebraska Coach Tom Osborne said. "We had some options that were pretty big plays, but the inside running game overall wasn't quite as good."

The Cats' ability to slow good running teams will certainly be tested in upcoming games against Kansas (Saturday, Oct. 28), Oklahoma (Nov. 4) and Iowa State (Nov. 11), all sporting ground-based attacks.

"Kansas runs the ball well, and we're going to have to play better if we're going to stop them next week," Smith said.

And though the first loss of the season was painful for the Cats, Colston said they will recover.

"It's a hard thing to swallow for us, but we don't want to let it put a damper on our season. It's a learning thing, I think. And I think we'll grow from here on out," Colston said.

Mitch Running is brought down by Nebraska's Michael Booker. The Cornhusker defense held the Wildcats to just six points in the first half.

Huskers top Cats, 49-25

Todd Stewart
assistant sports editor

LINCOLN, Neb. — The Nebraska mascot, Herbie Husker, might have been the first to know it was over.

With just more than five minutes gone in the second quarter, after Cornhusker quarterback Tommie Frazier's 11-yard touchdown strike to a leaping Sheldon Jackson in the back corner of the Wildcat end zone, the mascot signaled that the end was near for the Cats.

Tying a rope around a stuffed Wildcat, Herbie hung the cat from a goalpost and took a bat and knocked its head off, signaling what would become a 49-25 Nebraska win.

From that point, the Cats would not score again until the fourth quarter. But the Huskers might not have needed Herbie because the beating began early in the first quarter.

After the Huskers went three-and-out on their first possession, the Cats couldn't counter. On fourth down and 17 on their 35-yard line, the Cats were forced to punt — and that's where the head knocking began.

Freshman punter James Garcia's punt was fielded at the Nebraska 21-yard line by Husker returner Mike Fullman in the left corner of the Cat pursuit. Fullman went over, around and through K-State defenders on the sidelines for a 79-yard punt-return touchdown and the first score of the game.

Frazier said the special-teams score gave the Huskers momentum for the rest of the first half.

"I think we got a lot of momentum early with the punt return," Frazier said. "I think it took a lot of emotion out of them in the first half."

K-State coach Bill Snyder said the problems for the Cats compounded from the point of the punt return.

"The kicking game got us into a hole to begin with, and then it happened to our offense and our defense," Snyder said.

"You can't make some of the mistakes we made against a team like Nebraska and expect anything to happen other than what happened."

K-State hope was kept alive in the first quarter after an 18-yard touchdown pass from quarterback Matt Miller to stretched-out wide receiver Kevin Lockett in the end zone, but the extra point attempt was wide left by kicker Martin Gramatica, and the Cats would pull no closer to the Huskers.

And they would get no lucky breaks.

On a second-and-goal play from the Wildcat 2-yard line late Nebraska's Ahman Green avoids Nyle Wiren and the Wildcat defense. Green rushed for 109 yards for the Cornhuskers.

in the first quarter, Husker running back Clinton Childs lost control of the pitch from Frazier, and the ball squirted out of his hands at the goal line and into the end zone, where Husker Jon Vedral fell on it for a touchdown.

Already down 28-6 late in the second quarter, the nail was put in the Cat coffin when a Miller shovel pass was tipped at the line of scrimmage by Husker linebacker Chad Kelsay into the arms of teammate Luther Hardin, who took the ball in from three yards out for another Nebraska touchdown. Snyder blamed some of his team's mishaps on emotion.

"We just couldn't handle the emotion of the ball game, and that's my role," Snyder said.

Backup quarterback Brian Kavanagh, who relieved Miller in the fourth quarter, said it wasn't the emotion that was the problem.

"Emotion's great and all, but you've got to execute," Kavanagh said. "We just didn't go out and execute today."

The Cats would get on the boards two more times, after Kavanagh relieved Miller and threw touchdown passes to wide receiver Mitch Running and Lockett, but a 12-yard touchdown reception by Husker I-back Ahman Green would close the game and the 24-point Nebraska win.

Kavanagh said credit for the win should go to the Nebraska defensive line.

"Their defensive line is dominating, just dominating. They've got great team speed, and they just want the ball," Kavanagh said. "They're relentless. They just keep coming and coming and coming."

Miller said the Husker defense left its marks on him.

"I took some shots, but playing the position I play, you're going to take some shots," Miller said.

After a 10-for-24 passing day with two interceptions and the first Cat loss of the season, Miller said people can lay the blame for the defeat on whomever they want.

"I'm the quarterback, and I'll take all the blame anyone wants to shovel out."

FOGLE RECOVERING

K-State linebacker DeShawn Fogle was taken to a Lincoln, Neb., hospital for X-rays Saturday night after the Nebraska game simply as a precaution, Coach Bill Snyder said. Fogle sustained a neck injury late in the fourth quarter but is expected to be all right.

Indian mascots destroy respect they are meant to instill

Here it is, World Series time, and my worst baseball nightmare has come true.

The Atlanta Braves are playing the Cleveland Indians.

DAN LEWERENZ

Not that I have anything in particular against the players on either team. And I really don't care about baseball (one wonders how I became sports editor) enough to dislike one organization or the other.

But I do dislike their mascots, and the thought of the entire sports world focusing its attention on the Braves and the Indians is more than I can handle.

I find Indian mascots degrading, and I find the behavior they encourage among fans appalling.

Not that everyone agrees with me. Cleveland Indians' fans who are up on their team history often note that their selection of a mascot was originally a tribute to a Native American pitcher/outfielder who played for Cleveland around the turn of the century.

Louis F. Sockalexis, a Penobscot Indian from Old Town, Maine, batted .331 for the Cleveland Spiders in 1897. Eighteen years later, when a local newspaper held a contest to find a new nickname for the team (which had been called the Broncos, Blues and Naps in addition to Spiders), "Indians" was chosen as a tribute to Sockalexis.

Certainly there is nothing wrong with naming the team as a tribute to one of its great players. But in forgetting that history, the respect that goes along with the tribute has also been left by the wayside.

I seriously doubt that Sockalexis looked anything like Chief Wahoo, the Indians' mascot. In fact, a brief examination of the way American Indians have been depicted over the years will show that Wahoo is your stereotypical drunk Indian — not exactly what Cleveland had in mind in 1915 as a tribute.

I wonder what Sockalexis would have thought of the drum that fans beat at Indians games, or the obnoxious chant Florida State Seminoles fans are so fond of.

If Sockalexis were alive today, would he be in the stands with his face painted, wearing chicken feathers and doing the Tomahawk Chop?

And if Sockalexis was a Penobscot from Maine, why would fans erect a tepee in his honor? Do you suppose he ever saw a tepee? Tepees were only used on the Plains.

More important, why do we as a society so readily accept such behavior?

Suppose Kansas City had chosen to honor Jackie Robinson by naming their baseball team the Negroes. Die-hard fans would come in black-face, and plastic spears would be sold by the thousands so fans could do the Hottentot Chop.

Call me crazy, but I think someone might take offense.

What's the difference between the reality of teams like the Washington Redskins, Central Michigan Chippewas and Manhattan Indians, and the imaginary Kansas City Negroes?

Mainly, it's one of tradition.

"Our team has always been this way," supporters cry. "What do you want us to do? Change our mascot? And if it's such a big deal, why did nobody care until now?"

To begin, I do want you to change your mascot. It's not like it's impossible — just ask the people at Stanford and Marquette Universities. Both abandoned their Indian mascots.

Find Indian mascots degrading, and I find the behavior they encourage among fans appalling.

DAN LEWERENZ
COLLEGIAN SPORTS EDITOR

And people have cared about and protested the use of Indian mascots for decades. Certainly more people are paying attention to the issue now, but to assert that nobody cared until now is like saying that nobody minded slavery until the outbreak of the Civil War.

I reserve my final appeal for the fans. There's no need for you to stop supporting your favorite team or boycott the local sports-memorabilia store. But stop a moment, and think about your actions.

Before you paint yourself at a Chiefs tailgate party, before you put feathers in your hair, before you join in the Tomahawk Chop, try to figure out why you are doing this.

Is it because of your undying respect for Sockalexis, Jim Thorpe, Billy Mills and other great Native American athletes?

Is it because you are a member of some tribe and you are celebrating in the manner you have learned from your family and your ancestors?

Is it because you once took an anthropology class and you are reenacting a ceremony pre-contact Illini performed at 14th Century football games?

Or are you just doing what everybody else is doing? If so, strike out on your own. Be original. Take a chance.

Show the respect for Native Americans that mascots supposedly represent.

Wildcats sweep Missouri

Rich Peffley

The K-State volleyball team won in impressive fashion over the Missouri Tigers Saturday night at Ahearn Field House.

The Wildcats downed the Tigers in a quick three-game sweep 15-7, 15-5 and 15-5, improving their record to 16-5 on the year. The Cats are 3-3 in Big 8 play.

As a team, the Cats hit a solid .370 for the match, and recorded 42 kills.

Leading the way for the Cats was junior Yolanda "Toie" Young. She hit .529 for the match on her way to 10 kills and only one error in 17 attempts.

Senior Jill Dugan had nine kills, and junior Kate DeClerk added eight.

Sophomore setter Devon Ryning continued her consistent play, recording 35 assists in the match.

The Cats' defense was stingy, allowing Mizzou to hit only .099 for the match.

Dugan had seven digs to lead the Cats defensively, while Kim Zschau and Mariela Fasce, both freshmen, each added six.

K-State coach Jim Moore said he was pleased with his team's effort.

"Everything I wanted to accomplish tonight was accomplished," Moore said. "We never did quit playing hard and never assumed we had the match in control. That's a good sign."

Up next for the Cats is a trip to Ames, Iowa, where they will face the Cyclones of Iowa State. Earlier this month, the Cyclones won a hard-fought, five-game match in Manhattan.

The next home match for the Cats is Saturday, when they will square off against the Oklahoma Sooners.

REVIEW

Musical art of storytelling stirs audience

Page Getz
contributing writer

Acoustic diva Katy Moffatt stirred up a little laughter and a lot of soul Saturday night at the Manhattan Arts Center, exhibiting dynamic humor and passionate sincerity in her music.

A storyteller and composer, Moffatt brewed folkish blues with a very prominent twang and pure emotion, through both the nightmares and fantasies of life.

Although Moffatt said she didn't consider herself a feminist, many of her songs, such as "Ain't I a Woman," written from transcripts of a speech by Sojourner Truth, approach the empowering of women with a light, but deliberate sarcasm.

"I've never thought of myself as a feminist, but I have consistently acted like one," she said. "I've always lived my own life independent of any other coalition, namely men."

Moffatt's rebellion and independence lead her to the left side of many issues. Her strong will is fortified by the 20 years she has been on the road touring since she first left home at age 17.

"I grew up in Texas, and I left literally as soon as I could," Moffatt said. "I wasn't very conscious of the expectations that the social structure had for women, that expected women to do these things and not to do other things."

"I was always crossing invisible lines or breaking unwritten rules. I was always stepping over lines I could not see that everybody else could, and I felt like a freak," she said.

"I stand on the feminist side of many very personal issues."

Opening for Moffatt, local singer and songwriter Ann Zimmerman had the audience literally snapping, tapping and singing along with her genuine kindred spirit and quaint charm in songs like "Who'd a Ever Thought I'd Fall For a Cowboy" and "The Rolling Home 1-70 Blues."

Moffatt's latest project was a compilation called "Tulare Dust — A Songwriter's Tribute to Merle Haggard," and she is scheduled to visit the studio again for her eighth recording and third co-production with Tom Russell.

Bird House Productions sponsored the musicians as part of its acoustic series.

The development of the organization's endeavor to build an acoustic-type venue has been a gradual but ambitious effort with the vision of David Kamerer, founder of Bird House.

"It was David's idea, and it evolved with the friendship," Steve Martini, member of Martini said.

"We make a good group in decision making. We sort of grabbed each other by the collars and drug each other into it."

In conjunction with Bird House, Jim Hamilton, president of the Manhattan Arts Center, said he is committed to supporting this type of art and bringing the arts to the community.

"Bird House Productions has brought this to the center, and we're just glad to be able to work with them to do this," said Hamilton, associate professor and philosophy department head.

A radical concept from Mother Boyle.

Visiting ballet instructor brings NYC to Little Apple

■ Dance program brings guest artist to K-State to teach appreciation course

Camille Wood
staff reporter

The third floor of Ahearn Field House has a rich culture unseen by most students.

This is a culture not seen simply by opening up the heavy swinging doors and peering into an empty room furnished only with white walls, mirrors, stretch bars and hardwood floors. Rather, it's a culture seen only when dancers fill the room with their talent, their grace and their appreciation for the arts.

Ahearn houses these elegant yet strong figurines within its monumental confines and keeps them hidden from the rest of K-State's busybody, rushed, hectic lifestyle.

Within the brick mass, peace, comfort and pleasures can be found.

These elements can't be avoided when the rhythm of classical piano marries each dancer with fluttering butterfly wings and careful fawn steps, with reaching swan necks arching and a panther's fixed and focused gaze.

Ballet tames the human to move with the grace of all animals. When you're good enough, great enough, that grace enables the best to roam throughout the world.

Denmark, Russia, Holland, Israel, Germany, England, Japan and the United States have all been dance territories to the great Paul Boos, classical ballet teacher and visiting instructor to K-State.

"They brought me here to teach and lecture a dance appreciation course," he said. "We wanted everyone to benefit from my being here."

Boos, a New York native, spent last week sharing his knowledge with K-State ballet, jazz and modern dancers, through lecture and dance.

Grace Hwang, pre-law adviser and business school instructor, said the K-State Dance Program raised money to bring Boos here by holding a silent auction and a spring dance dinner.

The dance department attempts to raise money each semester to bring a guest artist in to teach students.

"My sister, Jean, was a dancer at K-State, and that's why I decided to help the KSU Dance Program," Hwang said.

She said the program has a three-prong mission — to raise funds for the school, bring in successful artists and improve facilities and organize the annual presentation of "The Nutcracker."

"This is his first experience teaching college," Hwang said. "Before, he only taught professional dance companies."

Boos began dancing in South Dakota at age 8. By 15, he was studying dance on his own in New York, where he joined the highly-acclaimed New York City Ballet at 18. Many K-State dancers also started dancing at a young age.

Mandy Pilcher, freshman in dance, said she has been dancing since she was 3 years of age, but upon attending

K-State, she found that there is always more to learn.

"I came here and felt like I've never danced before," Pilcher said. "It's so different."

Boos said most of his instruction focused on discipline and working with groups.

"I think everybody is so enthusiastic. They love to dance," he said.

Boos danced with NYCB for 13 years, but a relentless Achilles tendon prompted him to teach more and dance less. Boos never hung up his ballet shoes after retiring from active dance in 1990; they are still part of his attire.

Boos dances while instructing. His lean, muscular body floats on the hardwood and glides through the air with arms held perfectly up, and toes instantly on point upon demand.

"It's all about energy and lengthening," Boos said, stressing the importance of stretching legs. "If you stop the energy, everything gets tight."

His routines ranged in variety, but the dance lab overall enforced muscle isolation, balance, concentration, grace, limb extension, poise and reverence etiquette born from royal theaters in Europe.

"It's all about presentation," Boos said while counting. "Prep 1, turn in, out, plié, half full, half flat, half full, half flat, repeat, full plié, flex, point and close."

The steps seemed too numerous to count, too plentiful to memorize.

"Weight should be forward so it's on the balls of your feet," Boos said. "I always say it should be like on a tightrope."

Dena Fox, sophomore in dance choreography, early childhood and business, was part of the mostly female group.

Fox said Boos' presence helped her to feel confident and stay focused.

"With him here, it helps to learn what his emphasis is," she said.

She said it's hard to believe that she was able to learn from a man of Boos' esteem and thinks to herself "Wow. Was I really dancing with him?"

Melanie Furjanic, freshman in dance, said she has already danced with a professional dance company called Ballet Dallas. Regardless, she's still awestruck when reflecting on Boos' presence.

"Look at him — he's amazing," Furjanic said. "You can just imagine how amazing he is."

Both women said they agreed that learning from Boos was an incredible experience and opportunity.

Hwang said she hopes more dancers will be able to benefit from the same type of opportunity in the future but doesn't see that happening without more collegiate support.

"I think K-State should support its dancers like they support their other athletes," Hwang said. "Because that's what they are — superb athletes."

IMPEACH

"I have been in Senate for four years, and I thought it was OK if I missed one meeting."

Henry said he missed the Senate retreat because he had to work.

When students filed to run for Senate seats, they signed an agreement saying they would attend the Senate retreat the weekend of Sept. 9-10. The agreement said if senators could not attend, it would be considered an unexcused absence.

Henry said he signed the agreement, but it did not specify that the retreat would be out of town.

Henry works as a bartender, and a significant part of his income comes from working Friday and Saturday nights. He said he needed the money to pay for living expenses.

"I work three to four days a week so I can stay in school," he said. "The nights I have off I spend at Senate or working with other organizations to do something for the students on campus. I thought it was unfair that I would not have an opportunity to work."

At a Senate meeting before the retreat, Henry said he told the body he would not be able to attend the retreat because he had to work.

Potter said he would not be able to excuse him from the retreat for that reason.

Henry's third absence was due to a trip he took to Colorado. He said he was visiting relatives he had not seen for some time and went to a Monday night football game.

"The absence was a mistake," he said. "This was something I had never been able to do and probably would not be able to do for some time. I took a chance and went."

"I should have communicated with John before I left."

Except in the case of an emergency, Potter said, he needed to know about an absence 24 hours in advance. Potter said Henry did not contact him about missing the Tuesday Senate meeting.

Henry was a member of the student body president's cabinet his freshman year, served as an intern and has been a senator for three years.

"I have given every Thursday night I had in college to that organization because I love helping students," he said. "I sit in that room because I feel I can do something to make the campus better."

"I would never do anything to shirk the responsibilities I have been given."

Potter said senators' service records should not be considered during the impeachment process.

"The rules say if there are three or more unexcused absences, impeachment is started," he said.

"Senate made the rules, and all senators have to follow them, no matter who they are."

Potter said he was obligated to impeach members who did not follow the rules.

"I took an oath to obey the by-laws. I would be a hypocrite if I didn't enforce the impeachment rules in the by-laws," he said. "Senate would be hypocritical if it did not vote to impeach members who have three absences."

Darcie Allen, chair of Senate Operations Committee, said there was no point in having attendance rules if they were not enforced.

She said she thought Potter had been consistent in his enforcement of the policy.

She said Henry was not being singled out. No other senators have three or more absences at this time.

The impeachment process would be started if a majority of the Senate Operations Committee voted to sponsor a bill of impeachment against Henry when it meets at 9 tonight in the Office of Student Activities and Services.

That bill would go before Senate for first readings Thursday, and other senators would be able to ask questions about the bill. The bill would be scheduled for a vote the next Thursday.

If two-thirds of Senate vote in favor of the impeachment bill, Student Tribunal would consider the case and decide whether Henry should be removed from Senate.

If the committee decides to begin impeachment proceedings, Henry will be the first active senator since 1992 to be impeached.

None of the three senators who were impeached in 1992 were removed from Senate because the bills of impeachment failed to receive the necessary two-thirds vote in Senate to advance them.

and enjoyable.

The second half of the concert featured Clark Terry with the K-State Jazz Concert Band.

Those students who performed solos did not hold back, as exhibited by a shoulder shakin' trombone player and a saxophone player who was groovin' around the microphone.

Watching these young, talented students put a smile on Terry's face.

Terry has been reared as a promoter of the jazz culture, and he is known as America's number-one jazz educator.

"To keep this art form alive, you've got to keep involved by staying in touch with the young people," he said.

Terry said not everything can be put into books.

"It is so hard to put down on paper scat-tat-tat-zuwie-bah-dah-dah," he said. "One has to be there to experience it for themselves."

Sylvia Cuenca, drummer and member of the quintet, said she is continually learning from Terry and enjoys the experience to work with him.

"I have learned so much since working with him, like about jazz history," she said. "It is an inspiration and a challenge for me to be able to play with Clark."

Together, Terry and the K-State Jazz Band performed such songs as "Wounded Knee," "Squeeze Me, But Please Don't Tease Me," "Sheba" and "On The Road to K-State."

Overall, this concert was just a great experience.

"It is the best of jazz," Wilson said. "And you do not have to drive to New York to hear it."

ITCHY, BURNING EYES?
The fall season is bursting upon us and with it a host of people will suffer the vague, irritating reactions associated with allergies. The first step to relief is to make sure the symptoms are actually caused by an allergy and not an eye infection.
Once the cause of the red eye is known, appropriate treatment can be started. Get to the bottom of the problem, and get rid of those red, itchy eyes.

K-Rock marks anniversary

■ Station celebrates 5 years with album format

Scott Allen Miller
contributing writer

Five bands celebrated five years of K-Rocking in Manhattan Thursday night.

KMKF-101.5 FM threw itself a party at Bombers upstairs to celebrate the station's change to the album-oriented rock format that so many radio listeners in Manhattan like. On the bill were Scepter, 425 Main, Smudge, Catfish and Wakeland.

On hand at the show were K-Rock on-air personalities Marty Myers, who did much of the organizing of the show as the station's promotions director, and Raubin Pierce, programming and music director of the station.

The crowd, a mix of students and mostly blue-collar locals, never really got larger than 50 or so people at one time, although many people came and went during the night, making the show's total attendance somewhere closer to 100.

Wichita's Scepter started the show, followed by the metallic sounds of Lawrence's 425 Main, which received its most enthusiastic response for its set-closing cover of the Doors' "Break On Through." This was, after all, a party for a station that plays a lot of classic rock.

Smudge, hot on the tails of its tie for first place at the recent Opus 9 Band Competition, took the stage third. In spite of the drummer's lack of, well, flexible tempo, people danced to the envelope-filtered sounds of Hollis Berry's guitar and his Glenn Danzig-on-ecstasy vocals.

The crowd thinned after Smudge left the stage, not waiting to hear what was to be offered by the Great White North.

Catfish, a band from Vancouver that continues to blur the line between metal and hip hop, performed next to last. The band's set was only about six songs long, significantly shorter than originally planned. The guys in Catfish failed to get much response from the Manhattan crowd until they played an updated cover of the Rolling Stones' "Miss You."

It's reassuring that no matter what nation the bands are from, Manhattan audiences tend to prefer songs by more famous acts they've heard on the radio or seen on MTV.

This demonstrates consistency and rules out the possibility that Manhattan crowds are somehow biased against up-and-coming music by American bands.

"Wear It Well," from the band's debut "Neighbors and Dogs" album, will be heard in an upcoming episode of "Mad TV" on the Fox Network, vocalist Kevin Hemeon said. The set closed with a heavily-reworked version of the classic blues tune made most famous by Led Zeppelin, "When the Levee Breaks."

Wakeland, which took the stage at 1 a.m., is from Norman, Okla., a scene that has spawned the bands Chainsaw Kittens and the Nixons.

Wakeland's music, which vocalist and guitarist Chris Sullivan said has been described as Anglo power pop, digs from the same vein that Gin Blossoms, Mission U.K., Soul Asylum and Collective Soul have been mining for a few years.

Wakeland's music, which is danceable but not especially memorable live, is simple, melodic, catchy and easy to grasp. People who find themselves tuning into Sunny 102.5 more than K-Rock would probably like Wakeland's debut album, "Magnetic."

Although Catfish was tight, intense and focused its whole set, Wakeland's simplicity was somewhat marred by a shoddy performance. Perhaps Sullivan, who had been hitting the sauce since before the show and even took a short break in the band's set to down some shots of Jaegermeister, probably explained why.

"I think this is the most fucked up we've ever played," he told the crowd.

There were no covers in Wakeland's set and the songs weren't as familiar to club goers as Smudge's were, so the crowd didn't get as enthused for Wakeland as it did for previous bands. If you missed or really liked Wakeland and want to hear the band's music again, one of the songs from "Magnetic" will be featured during the Nov. 6 episode of "Melrose Place," Sullivan said.

By the end of the night, K-Rock had given away a Fender Stratocaster guitar and had provided a good-sized crowd with an evening of live music.

One can't help but wonder if the remains of Foghat, Nazareth, Blue Oyster Cult or Grand Funk Railroad couldn't have packed in the trailer-park-and-barrack crowd that K-Rock tends to cater to rather than the residence hall and fraternity house demographic group that the bands were aimed to draw from. More people might have showed up.

ALCOHOL

A panel consisted of three students, who did not wish to be identified, and Bill Arck, director of alcohol and drug education at University Counseling Services.

"Lisa" told the story of her stepfather.

Alcohol was in Lisa's house as long as she can remember, she said.

When she was 3 years old, her mother would give her sips of beer, she said. "My stepfather drinks, and he drinks a lot," she said.

The house becomes very quiet when he comes home, Lisa said.

"We're scared to talk because we don't know what kind of reaction we'll get," she said.

Getting drunk became a problem for "Ann" as she entered her freshman year in college.

Ann graduated with a high grade point average from high school, and after her first semester, she was threatened with being kicked out of the university.

She later transferred to K-State and was placed on probation, she said.

"I got a 4.0 my first semester here because I cut down on my drinking considerably," she said.

The problems that these students talked about are typical of college students, Arck said.

Although people typically think of freshmen as consuming a lot of alcohol, seniors are also heavy users, he said.

"The hardest drinkers at K-State are seniors," he said.

If a person has been drinking to the point of vomiting, the person needs to be monitored every 10 to 15 minutes, Arck said.

If the person's breathing becomes shallow, if the skin turns an abnormal color or if you cannot wake the person, an ambulance should be called, Arck said.

"The way you get a hangover is because you drink too much," he said.

It takes 8 ounces of water per beer to help your body get rid of the alcohol, Arck said.

"Drink a lot of water," he said.

It always helps to hear stories from peers rather than authority figures, John Danos, director of Goodnow Hall, said.

"I thought it was interesting how the people could actually share what they've been through," Alicia Kendall, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine, said.

It was positive, and there should be more programs of similar nature, Danos said.

"There was a need to educate our residents about responsible drinking," Thompson said.

Board votes to allow Halloween activities

LOS ALTOS, Calif. (AP) — It was a scary sight for the Los Altos school board — hundreds of people, some in costume, howling about a ban on Halloween celebrations at six elementary schools.

Perhaps spooked Oct. 16 by the overflow turnout at the hearing, the board voted 4-0, with one abstention, to allow holiday activities in the classroom.

"I think they were persuaded that Halloween is not a religious holiday, just a holiday that is viewed as religious by some people, and there is a difference," Superintendent Margaret Gratiot said.

The board voted two weeks ago to reschedule costume parades or Halloween parties for after-school hours because some parents felt the holiday has satanic connotations.

The ruling set off such a chorus of boos that the board voted to return to its former policy. Schools will be allowed to schedule their own celebrations, either during school time, after class or on weekends. Students whose parents object will be allowed to go home.

Historical dates in the U.N.

1941 - Inter-Allied declaration was signed in London by all nations at war for "a world in which, relieved of the menace of aggression, all may enjoy economic and social security."

1942 - Declaration by United Nations was signed by 26 nations in Washington, D.C. approving the basic points of the Atlantic Charter. This was also the first time the name United Nations was used.

1943 - President Roosevelt had the concept of one world, meaning all the problems of other countries are interconnected. He said we are a world community and we need to act collectively.

May 8, 1945 - Germans surrender to end the European portion of World War II.

June 26, 1945 - United Nations charter was signed in San Francisco.

Sept. 2, 1945 - Japanese surrender to end the final portion of World War II.

Oct. 24, 1945 - The United Nations entered into force and this is the date everyone acknowledges as U.N. Day.

Dec. 14, 1946 - A gift of $8.5 million from U.S. millionaire John D. Rockefeller Jr. was accepted by the United Nations to buy 18 acres in New York City as the site of the permanent headquarters.

March 23, 1950 - World Meteorological Organization is established to promote international reporting and observation of weather.

June 20, 1950 - North Korean Army crossed the 38th parallel and was headed for an invasion in Seoul, South Korea. The involvement by the United States and other U.N. nations was an action called upon by the United Nations.

July 27, 1953 - A cease fire was called in the Korean War, yet this was seen as a failure because the U.N. forces failed to get the North Korean Army to surrender.

1956 - Suez crisis. Egypt wanted to nationalize the Suez canal area and the French and United Kingdom stepped up to stop this. The United Nations stepped in to resolve the conflict. This is a success because both the United States and the Soviet Union agreed with how the matter was resolved.

1961 - U.N. troops begin fighting in the Congo (now Zaire) to restore order in the civil war.

1967 - Middle East War between Egypt, Syria, Jordan and Israel. Egypt, Syria and Jordan tried for six years through the United Nations to regain territory lost to Israel. They failed.

1973 - Egypt, Syria and Jordan got disgusted with delays with the United Nations and so the Arab nations went to war.

1975 - International Women's Year was declared by the United Nations to promote women's equality.

1976 - United Nations for the first time had to stand up to a superpower — the Soviet Union and their involvement with Angola.

1980 - The United Nations had mixed results with Ethiopia. They had a both political and humanitarian agenda. They did restore peace and some political stability. These results will then have an effect with the problems the United Nations will have with Somalia.

1989-1991 - United States and other U.N. members carried out U.N. sanctions against Iraq during the Gulf War. The United Nations still has sanctions in place against Iraq.

1991-1992 - United Nations tries to restore peace in Somalia. United Nations failed and had to withdraw, achieving little.

1995 - United Nations takes a more active role with enforcing sanctions. For the first time, the United Nations orders air strikes against Bosnia Serb Army.

50 years of cooperation

■ Today marks 50th anniversary of United Nations

J. Scot
staff reporter

The United Nations needs a cake that will serve its 185 members at a celebration to honor its 50th anniversary today.

The United Nations' membership consists of representatives from 185 countries out of the 207 recognized countries in the world.

The members' purpose includes the maintenance of international peace, security and the development of friendly relations among nations.

It also advocates the respect of human rights and cooperation among nations to solve international problems.

The United Nations was established as a center for unifying the actions of nations in attaining these goals.

"The U.N. handles human-rights issues to cease-fires, and no single government — remember the U.N. is not a government — can cope with the menu the U.N. wakes up to every day," Alden Williams, associate professor of political science, said.

The United Nations was founded after the signing of the Declaration by United Nations in 1942 in San Francisco by 26 member-nations that approved the basic points of the Atlantic Charter for the United Nations.

These points included respecting the right of all people to choose their own style of government, willingness to share natural resources, desiring economic growth and adjustment and improvement of labor conditions and standards.

It also included establishment of peace within each country to guard against outside threats. This peace would allow all waterways to remain open for travel and trade.

The charter's last point was that all nations surrender the use of force so peace might be established.

The No. 1 accomplishment the United Nations has made in the past 50 years is survival, Williams said.

Another accomplishment is that among seated members whose countries are enemies, there is a relative absence of hostility, he said.

There has been a movement to make sure the United Nations survives, said Dale Herspring, professor and head of the political science department.

"It is not an innovative movement, rather a grass-roots effort to drum up support for the United Nations," Herspring said.

Some people would like to get rid of the United Nations, and the movement is an attempt to revive support for United Nations in the United States, Herspring said.

"We do not have to get rid of it for the heck of it, though that is what some people would like to do," he said.

The United States has questioned its membership in the United Nations and considered leaving the body.

"Historically, we have funded over half of the U.N.'s budget. Now, with a more conservative Congress, there's been cuts, and we're now more than a billion in

STUDENT SENATE

Committee votes against impeachment

Cristina Janney

Student Senate Operations Committee voted there were not grounds to impeach an arts and science senator at its meeting Monday night.

The committee voted 5-8 against a motion that stated there were grounds for impeachment against Michael Henry, arts and sciences senator, for having three unexcused absences from Senate meetings.

Henry was a member of the student body president's cabinet his freshman year, served as an intern and has been a senator for three years.

According to the Student Governing Association Constitution and by-laws, three unexcused absences from Senate are grounds for impeachment.

The Senate chair is responsible for determining what absences are excused. John Potter, Senate chair, said he will excuse senators from meetings because of classes, tests, illnesses, deaths of family members or other family emergencies.

Study sessions, social functions or trips are not grounds for excused absences, Potter said. If a senator has an unexcused absence, the senator's college loses a vote for that meeting.

Potter said Henry had three unexcused absences: one of the first Senate meetings of the term in April, the Senate retreat and a Senate allocations meeting Oct. 17.

Henry said he missed the first meeting because of a fraternity function and said he missed the Oct. 17 meeting because he was visiting relatives and attending a football game in Colorado. Henry said he accepted the decision of the chair that these two absences were

BOARD OF REGENTS

Regents aim for diversity

Kimberly Hefling
staff reporter

Administrators and faculty from each of the Kansas Board of Regents universities gathered at K-State Sunday for a two-day conference to examine ways to increase diversity at their schools.

More than 130 administrators and faculty members from each of the regents universities participated in events for the Second Annual Regents Conference on Diversity and Multiculturalism in the University Curriculum at the K-State Student Union.

"I think what is being discussed at the conference is important for educators at our universities," said Roger Berger, faculty member with the department of English at Wichita State University. "The opportunity I have had to talk about these kinds of thing is a pleasure as both an individual and a scholar."

The purpose of the conference was to provide an opportunity for faculty from the regents' schools to expand their expertise in the academic areas of diversity and multiculturalism.

Berger said he believes what we see as knowledge has fundamentally changed. As a result, curriculum needs to change too.

"Universities must change to keep up or become irrelevant," Berger said. "Otherwise, they won't serve any purpose."

The conference was the result of a committee established three years ago by the regents to examine ways to improve diversity related issues on campus.

The schools are trying to do this through various means, including strengthening the curriculum at the universities and hiring a larger percentage of minority and women faculty, K-State Provost James Coffman said.

American Red Cross.

The winner gets a trophy and the bragging rights. Last semester, K-State lost the trophy to KU for the first time. KU had its blood drive last week, and it collected 675 units of blood.

"We're expecting a 50- to 100-percent increase in donors this semester," Nancy Powell, American Red Cross Coordinator said.

"With that type of turnout, we shouldn't have any trouble getting the trophy back," she said.

To boost participation, the Red Cross is having a drawing to give away four portable compact disc players. Students have to donate blood to be registered for the drawing. The Red Cross needs critical levels of blood, Powell said.

"We're hoping the giveaway and the competition will boost the number of donors," Powell said.

Some students are donating out of the kindness of their hearts and not for the competition or the drawing.

Sarah Bishop, freshman in education, was one of the first students to donate, and she said there is no reason not to donate.

PHONY BOMBS SENT TO FAMILY, HAVE AUTHORITIES WORRIED

CULVER — Five phony bombs have been found in this small central Kansas town since the first of the year, and it has authorities on edge.

Asked after an incident during the weekend if the family targeted in the five incidents was in danger, Ottawa County Sheriff Kent White said, "You just don't know."

White said, "Somebody is just playing games now. But there is always that possibility that if they are sick enough to set hoax bombs out, they could switch and go to the real thing."

The five devices found in the past 10 months have contained no explosives, but they looked real enough that three were destroyed. Two others were kept intact after bomb squads determined they were not dangerous.

The latest bomb scare occurred Saturday when a device was discovered in the bed of a pickup truck at Donald Ayres' home. It was the second time in a week a phony bomb was found at his house. Another device was removed from Ayres' porch Oct. 16.

The sheriff said the intact devices would be sent to the Kansas Bureau of Investigation for analysis.

The earlier devices were found at Ayres' home and the homes of his family members.

Ayres, 26, said he was confident the person or persons responsible for planting the phony bombs would be found.

"It appears to be harassment of one family," White said Monday. "I don't want to comment further. We have some leads we are pursuing."

Culver is about 15 miles northwest of Salina.

ROCKET EXPLODES ON LIFTOFF

ATLANTIC, Va. (AP) — A privately built rocket carrying a satellite to conduct scientific experiments in space exploded about 45 seconds after liftoff from a NASA launch facility on Virginia's Atlantic Coast.

The five-story Conestoga rocket lifted off moments after NASA officials said the launch had been put on hold with just over two minutes left in the countdown.

The rocket soared upward, exploded and sent fiery fragments crashing into the ocean.

There were no known injuries and no immediate explanation for the blast at NASA's Wallops Island Flight Facility.

The launch of the 200-ton Conestoga has been postponed at least six times since the initial plan to send it aloft in July.

EER Systems Corp.

of Vienna built the rocket, which was carrying a one-ton capsule named METEOR with 14 experiments aboard.

The experiments, sponsored by NASA and various universities and private companies, ranged from cancer research to the effects of extreme cold on commercial high-capacity heaters.

The rocket was designed to carry small-to medium-sized payloads to and from an eventual space station.

Some of the experiments were to splash down 100 miles offshore in the Atlantic in a month.

Others were to stay in space approximately two years until they burned up in the atmosphere.

METEOR stands for Multiple Experiments Transporter to Earth Orbit and Return.

CONVICT REMAINS AT LARGE

DUTCH MILLS, Ark. (AP) — While Arkansas and Oklahoma officers ranked a 60-square-mile area for a three-time escapee, federal agents also looked for Chad Allan Beers in Kansas and Nebraska.

Beers escaped Saturday from the Washington County Jail, where he was being held on a federal escape charge.

Authorities believe Beers was still in the area early Monday, said Washington County sheriff's Capt. John Riggins.

"That's why we're keeping it going today. We don't feel that he's left the area," Riggins said.

The search area in Washington County and Adair County, Okla., was about six miles wide east to west and about 10 miles long, north to south, said Arkansas State Police spokesman Wayne Jordan.

Meanwhile, federal agents kept an eye out for Beers in Lawrence, where Beers grew up, said Deputy U.S. Marshal Mike Blevins of Fort Smith.

A search also was under way near Lincoln, Neb., where he was arrested after a 1994 escape from the Sebastian County Jail.

"We're starting to work from the back end, hoping we can find something that way," Blevins said.

IN SEARCH OF THE RODEO L I F E

■ Ropers' love for rodeo has them ready for circuit finals

Collegian staff

Every minute of every day, T.C. Dawson is thinking about roping cattle.

"Twenty-four hours a day, I'll be sitting in class and thinking about it," Dawson, junior in psychology, said.

In his mind's eye, he moves quickly and cleanly. Dawson, who is usually a header, said he plans what he will do if a steer runs hard, slow or acts just plain stupid.

"It's hard to be fast on something really slow," Dawson said.

He said visualization helps him stay ready for anything that might happen in the arena and that is why he is so good. Or at least good enough to be at the Dodge Prairie Circuit Finals Rodeo at the Lazy E Arena in Guthrie, Okla., this week.

Today at 1:15 p.m., Dawson and his partner will ride into the arena for their first team roping event of the week. If they win, the next match is 3:30 p.m. Wednesday.

"I'll win it," Dawson said about the match today.

Dawson's strategy consists of attitude. If you think you're going to win, then you'll win, he said.

"If you doubt yourself, that's like admitting you're a failure," he said.

Dawson said he never thinks he's going to lose. He said he's practiced too much in his mind, in the pen and in his own backyard.

But no matter how much the team practices, the performance hinges on the type of steer they get in the pen.

"It's just a gamble. It's a crap shoot, roll of the dice," he said.

With each roll, the pressure increases, and the thirst for a win becomes addictive, Dawson said.

"Once you win, you can't hardly quit," he said. The money and prizes attached to each win is minimal.

The money merely supports Dawson for his next run. What really counts in the rodeo circuit is winning again, he said.

"I couldn't quit rodeo right now if I had to," Dawson said.

Whether Dawson will win this week in Guthrie is unknown, but it's pretty much a given he's going to make money at it, Sherlyn George, junior in animal science, said.

"I imagine he's going to make money at it, no problem," she said.

George lives with Dawson and her brother, Tim George. All three are part of K-State's Rodeo Club. Being able to handle the pressure of the rodeo is key for anybody participating in the circuit, she said.

Tim George, senior in animal science, rodeos with Dawson on the college circuit.

Being able to rope consistently is essential to any team roper, Tim George said. Team ropers rope steers slick around the horns, head or neck.

"Everyone tries to rope slick around the neck," Tim George said.

Tim George said he knows Dawson is a good roping partner because of the experience they have together.

"If he wasn't, I wouldn't be roping with him," he said.

Dawson and Tim George said they are thinking about buying their cards and going professional this summer.

That would mean hitting the circuit hard every week, Dawson said.

T.C. DAWSON
JUNIOR IN PSYCHOLOGY

Throughout the summer, the team can hit more than 18 rodeos.

But this week at Guthrie, Dawson is roping with another partner. Dawson has about seven or eight partners across the state whom he said he feels comfortable roping with. Dawson's partner at Guthrie is from the professional rodeo circuit.

After being in rodeos for as long as he can remember, Dawson said he knows who he likes to ride and rope with.

Dawson learned to rope from his dad and said he remembers being in an arena for the first time when he was five.

The timed events like team roping, calf roping and wrestling have always been Dawson's favorites, he said.

"There aren't any injuries," he said.

Bull and bronco riding events have no longevity. Competitors participate, beat their bodies up and usually only last on the circuit until they're 30, he said.

After the competition in Guthrie, Dawson will return to K-State and participate in the Alumni Rodeo Saturday.

the College of Arts and Sciences at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln, gave the keynote address Sunday for the conference titled, "Multiple Dimensions of Culture in our University Classrooms."

"No matter what we see in the future, we must begin difficult dialogue now," Carranza said.

Although it is difficult, he said, it is important to get issues out into the open and discuss them.

"We're raising a generation that is stimulus-rich and experience-poor," Carranza said.

To combat this, Carranza said, higher education must play an active role in combating multicultural related problems.

Following his speech, members of the audience were given the opportunity to participate in a discussion period with Carranza.

Johnnie Love, reference and culture diversity librarian at the University of Kansas, said she believes the main issue dealing with multiculturalism is how to bring others to really look at accepting everyone's culture.

"It sounds simple, but it's actually very complex," Love said.

During the conference, Love had the opportunity to serve as a facilitator at the arts and humanities workshop.

Love said one of the concerns from instructors was that although they were dealing with diversity in the classroom, the instructors weren't sure if they were doing the right thing.

"They are making an effort to get the info out, but they're feeling insecure about how they're getting the idea across," Love said.

Love said she believes it is important for instructors to become acquainted with the body language of students to achieve full participation from students.

"How to get involvement with all students is still a complex issue," she said.

"There is nothing written in stone saying, 'This is how you should do it.'"

Kim Wilcox, chairman of the speech, language and hearing department at KU, said he came to the conference partly because of his involvement with a committee dealing with diversity at KU.

"I hope to learn ideas about how to make diversity more of an issue on campus," Wilcox said.

He said he hopes to benefit from the speakers and also from having conversations about diversity-related issues with other faculty members.

"It's not often that people from all universities come together for something like this," Wilcox said.

Coffman, who chaired the regents committee examining multiculturalism in the regents universities three years ago, said he believes the issue has become more of a priority in the last six to eight years.

in our opinion

Timing of Landon Lecture finally suits students

But if you're about to call Landon Lecture Committee Chairman Charles Reagan to thank him for finally listening to the students, put down that phone.

People should pack into Bramlage Coliseum like sardines at 7 tonight for the 103rd Landon Lecture Series featuring U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno.

Why? For one reason, students have a chance to gain insight into the mind of the nation's leading law enforcer.

Hey, it's not Soul Asylum, but it should be worth a drive to Bramlage.

Reno backed the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms during the Waco standoff. She led the FBI crusade to bring Oklahoma City bombing suspect Timothy McViegh to justice.

And, most recently, she urged the New York Times to publish the manifesto of the Unabomber, that elusive fugitive who likes to mail bombs to his victims.

Interesting, eh?

Many students will also like the fact that 1) the event is free, and 2) it is at 7 tonight, providing an excellent opportunity to see an influential figure in American politics at a time that doesn't conflict with most classes.

Past lectures have been inconveniently scheduled in the morning, and the administration has been lackluster in urging faculty to let students out of class for the events.

But if you're about to call Landon Lecture Committee Chairman Charles Reagan to thank him for finally listening to the students, put down that phone. It was no act of the committee that brought this lecture to a convenient time. It was at Reno's behest.

Students should take advantage of this freak scheduling accident.

If people show up en masse tonight, it will send the Landon Lecture Committee a simple message — we want these events scheduled at times that are more convenient for us.

U.S. bullies Haiti with policies

MATT HAWKINS

I think most of us learned in kindergarten not to bully the other students. We were told a bully is liked by no one and only acts that way because of their own insecurities.

It is therefore questionable why we let our own government get away with being a bully. Instead of stealing lunch money, though, our leaders rob whole countries of their ability to function independently.

A classic case in point is Haiti. To refresh your memory, this is the country we were on the brink of invading last year until former President Jimmy Carter arrived at the last minute to restore peace.

The bad men were forced to leave, and the beloved President Jean-Bertrand Aristide triumphantly returned from his exile in the United States. Plenty of aid was promised, and everything was hunky dory.

Or so we thought. The real situation wasn't nearly so simple, and as a result, the most common cry now heard in the streets of Port-au-Prince is, "Yankee go home."

"Why?" you may ask. "Didn't we help those ingrates throw off an oppressive regime last year?"

The answer is, not really. Although several of the primary figures in the coup d'état were deported, most of the oppressors remain and with the backing of the United States, still exercise power.

According to the Haitian weekly newspaper, Haiti Progres, the deal struck with the Aristide government seeks to bolster the bankrupt and politically weak bourgeoisie, as well as the military sector.

It's to be noted that these are the same people who backed the coup d'état in the first place.

In addition, although none of the coup participants were supposed to seek political office until 1997, many freely participated in the elections over the last several months. According to Haiti Progres, most of these "Received financial support from the U.S. and Haitian governments."

Does this make sense? Not if you take the position that the United States wears a white hat and the World Bank is set up to help poor countries.

The reality of the situation is that the United States finds the greediest bastards it can and says, "Hey, you let our business interests come in and enslave your people, and we'll make sure you get very rich for doing nothing."

The World Bank and the International Monetary

Fund are another part of the problem. All over the world, they have succeeded primarily in keeping third-world countries poor and deep in debt.

In Haiti, the United States has insisted on strict adherence to the plan set up by the World Bank. This is despite widespread resistance by the populace to these programs. The attitude of the United States is, "We know what's best for you, and you'll do what we say, like it or not."

No, all is not rosy for our neighbor to the south. Instead of spurring on growth, the United States has deliberately set up programs to keep Haiti one of the poorest nations in the world.

There are, however, signs of hope. Haiti marked the fourth anniversary of the coup d'état, Sept. 30. According to Haiti Progres, there were demonstrations, speak-outs and religious services nationwide protesting current policies.

The people will not be silent forever.

All bullies are tough until they get punched in the nose. If the United States doesn't watch out, this is exactly what is going to happen to them. It's happened before, as in the case of the Shah of Iran. When this U.S.-backed bully boy was finally overthrown, it led to the Iran hostage crisis.

Let's not keep on making this same mistake. Let Haiti take charge of its own affairs.

CHILD CARE AT REC

Editor,

First, I would like to thank each and every individual who is supporting our cause. Students, faculty, staff and alumni have taken time — even class time — to speak out in support of our interest. Special thanks to Chuck Allen, Penny Suazo and Rick Martin.

I would also like to thank those people who are in opposition to our interest. It takes time and energy to write letters to the editor. And, better yet, you are keeping the issue alive.

We have asked for a playroom and were denied. We are not screaming discrimination. We are saying that because all students pay fees, all students should have access. There are four social work students, not five, engaged in this issue. And we do not need the help of the Collegian to get an A. We appreciate all the time and effort the Collegian is devoting to this issue.

As parents, we are unable to use the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. For safety reasons, children younger than 14 years old are not allowed. For student parents, finances are quite a challenge. Paying for any child care can be tough. A Child Watch program or playroom will assist parents in becoming healthier.

If it is still unclear as to why we need such a service, I challenge you to take two healthy, young children to the Rec Complex and work out. As one non-student parent said, "We are all people at the same university. We should stand as one and support each other."

A student's life is hectic. Can we conceivably say student parents have it any easier?

The face of the student population is changing. K-State has a non-traditional population of almost 30 percent. This is just one issue of several to come that we as a University may need to look at. Colorado and Nebraska have dealt with such a need; K-State should, too.

I would like to remind our supporters our P.O.C. number is 539-3632 and our march is scheduled for 1:45 p.m. Nov. 1, starting in the free-speech zone.

Uninformed commentary broadcasts ignorance

Watching the University of Nebraska game this weekend became just too painful after the first quarter, so I switched to the radio.

On the up side, listening to the game was much more pleasant than watching the game. On the down side, I was unexpectedly subjected to a political discussion between Mitch Holthus and his sportscaster team during halftime.

I don't know the name of the guy who said it, and I didn't think to write down what he said, so all I can say is that one of those guys said something like this:

"You know, everybody's been making a lot of noise about Medicare and balancing the budget and all sorts of things ... the Democrats keep whining, and the Republicans aren't doing much better."

"But ask yourself, during all this yelling and screaming, where's Bob Dole? He's not yelling and screaming. What we need in the White House is somebody who isn't going to spend all his time making noise, but who's going to sit down and get the job done."

Now, I wasn't even too happy with the way this schmuck was calling the game, something he's supposedly trained for.

I couldn't figure out why I was being subjected to his idiotic political analysis.

One person who was listening to the game with me heard his comments and she said, "That's the stupidest thing I've ever heard. I can't believe that guy gets a vote that has as much weight as mine."

This is a reasonable complaint, I think. Democracy, it seems to me, is a bad idea if there are people who vote without the benefit of even rudimentary political knowledge.

This guy, for example, hasn't been watching the news recently, or he'd know that Dole isn't a quiet guy. He certainly wasn't watching the news in the last presidential race, or he'd know Dole easily flies into a paralyzing rage on national television.

And it certainly hasn't occurred to this guy that an open debate about important issues, even a loud one, might be a good thing.

But it really doesn't bother me that this guy gets to vote just like me because, contrary to popular belief, we don't live in a democracy.

In a democracy, citizens vote on important decisions. In America, we vote to elect people to make these important decisions for us. And whoever we vote for, they always seem to make the same sort of decisions.

That might be because wealthy lobbyists have a lot more to offer our elected officials than any individual does with his or her one vote.

Money is power.

People who actually believe this country is a democracy should ask themselves why Congress is passing a capital-gains tax cut that will benefit less than 30 percent of the population (the 30 percent that has enough money to invest enough money to make enough interest that they owe capital-gains taxes).

So, because we are safely insulated from democracy, I'm not really concerned that this sportscaster dude gets his one vote.

What really bothers me is that he got a chance to air his idiotic opinion to thousands of people.

Many people like him who support Dole without a clue as to why will have one more stupid thing to say to people who try to get them to think about politics.

The media institutions in our country don't help things. They cost an incredible amount of money to run, so they, too, follow the money.

One way to follow the money is to make sure that political coverage, sitcoms, opinion pieces and everything else are short and catchy enough to appeal to the lowest common denominator of the public.

And, as far as political discussion goes, this sportscaster guy is the lowest common denominator.

So, most political coverage offered from the best daily newspapers (like the New York Times) to the worst of the sound-byte TV shows (like CNN Headline News), is at about the IQ level of the no-brainer Mr. Sportscaster gave us.

I am a true believer in the Bill of Rights. I would never claim this sportscaster guy doesn't have the right to state his opinion.

And because he works on radio, lots of people have to hear whatever opinion he has to offer.

But I have the right to whine about it.

DROPPING CLASS

Friday is the last day to drop a class.

Charles Marr, professor of horticulture, leans on a Howden pumpkin in a greenhouse Monday. Marr is involved in testing varieties of pumpkins to see if they are right to grow in Kansas.

JACK-O'-LANTERN FACTS

The largest varieties of pumpkins can reach more than 75 pounds.

The largest jack-o'-lantern was carved on Oct. 30, 1992 by Michael Green, Regina Johnson and Daniel Salsedo. The pumpkin weighed 827 pounds.

The largest number of jack-o'-lanterns gathered together in one place was at a Harvest Festival in Keene, N.H. in 1993. The pumpkins, carved on site, numbered 4,817.

RECIPE FOR PUMPKIN SEEDS

Carve a circle around the stem of the pumpkin.

Scoop the seeds and pulp out using a spoon.

Separate the pulp from the seeds.

Wash the seeds carefully, and arrange them on a cookie sheet.

To add flavor, you can drizzle butter, worcestershire sauce, barbecue sauce, garlic powder, seasoning or table salt over the seeds.

Cook at 300 degrees until the seeds are dry.

The K-State horticulture department is helping Kansas farmers test pumpkin hybrids.

stories by stephanie fuqua

As Linus sat in the field awaiting the arrival of the Great Pumpkin, he kept company with your basic, average pumpkins. Average size. Average orange color.

What Charles Schulz never imagined when he drew this scenario was that years later, pumpkins would have a very different look.

The Lumina pumpkin is so smooth you can't even see the ridges and is white in color — almost like an albino pumpkin.

The HMX 4695, a hybrid variety that is so new it has yet to be given a name, is a bright orange pumpkin about the size of a cantaloupe. The sides are also smooth, yet you can see where the ridges might be.

And yet one more variety, Ghost Rider, is a dark orange with a smoother skin, but you can feel the ridges on its sides. It's closer to the average pumpkin look.

All of these pumpkins are sitting in a greenhouse on the north side of Throckmorton Hall. Charles Marr, professor of horticulture, is wrapping up weeks of watching the different varieties to check for signs of spoilage.

He picks up a Baby Bear pumpkin and presses the sides to show that the pumpkin is getting a bit mushy.

"If a store has a pumpkin display, they don't want the bottom ones to get mushy," Marr said with a laugh.

Marr and the horticulture department work with Kansas farmers to test hybrid varieties that come from pumpkin producers for growing in Kansas conditions. The department also conducts research trials on new varieties and works on disease problems.

"We conduct research trials on new varieties. There is a lot of emphasis on smaller pumpkins, what we call baby pumpkins," Marr said.

"There are several disease problems that can cause distortions in coloration. We're doing work in controlling diseases and conducting studies in weed control." The pumpkin is a warm-weather crop that grows from early June through September. Even though people might not expect it, 5,000 acres of Kansas land is used to grow pumpkins.

"It's hard to say how many growers there are because so many farmers plant a few acres of this, a few acres of that," Marr said.

Marr said the K-State horticulture department has a significant effect on Kansas pumpkin production.

"I do think that the studies with varieties allows producers to screen out varieties that aren't right for them. They rely very heavily on our screening trials with pumpkin varieties," he said.

K-State is also one of the few places farmers can go for help with pumpkin crops.

"There is not a lot of other commercial information of expertise available," Marr said.

And contrary to reports in August and September, there really isn't a shortage of pumpkins in the Midwest.

"They had a very small crop on the East coast and an average crop of pumpkins in the Midwest. Some of our crops were shifting to the East, causing a little bit of pressure here in the Midwest to meet the demands, but there really isn't a shortage."

Many of the new varieties of pumpkins are hybrids. Everything from the baby pumpkins to smooth pumpkins are being tested at K-State.

"One of the trends is to develop a pumpkin that is quite smooth in order for it to be easier to paint," Marr said.

"The fall decorative market has become much stronger. People are doing more fall decorating, so the pumpkin market is moving up further in the year. Stores are putting out displays of pumpkins in early to mid-September."

White pumpkins are also becoming popular, Marr said.

"They tend to be quite smooth, so painted materials show up quite well."

become a pumpkin picasso

Whether you don't want the hassle and mess of carving a pumpkin, or you're just wanting for a different look for your jack-o'-lantern, painting pumpkins has become more popular in recent years.

Dennis Marten, owner of Ben Franklin Crafts, said Ben Franklin's sells a lot of acrylic paint, which people use to paint pumpkins.

"The two things people most often use is a cold-carving kit and acrylic paints to paint designs on the pumpkin," Marten said.

"They are especially good for people with smaller children who don't want them to carve with knives."

Allison Dudley, Wal-Mart employee, said Wal-Mart also has a variety of crafts available for people who are looking to add a different look to their jack-o'-lanterns.

"We have all the things to help you decorate — pumpkins, tools you need, stencils that you can put different designs on," Dudley said.

Neither store conducts any how-to classes, but Wal-Mart does have supplies for those who don't feel they are creative enough to design a pumpkin.

"We have sheets that have stencils on them that you can trace in order to get different design ideas," Dudley said.

Baby pumpkins are often used for decorating purposes. During the days before Halloween, many people like to paint miniature pumpkins, Charles Marr, horticulture professor, said.

Women's soccer needs players, coach

Dan Lowerenz

sports editor

Wanted: Women interested in playing for a competitive collegiate soccer club.

The K-State women's soccer club returned from their biggest tournament of the semester in Colorado (see Sports Clubs graphic) with one overwhelming need.

"We definitely need more people," forward Kelly Scott said.

As with most club sports, recruiting is difficult for the K-State women's soccer team. Most of the club's members played soccer in high school, but the team has to rely on personal contacts to get people to come out in college.

"We put up a few signs, but it's really word of mouth," midfielder Tonia West said. "I called the Athletic Department when I came to K-State to find out who the coach was because I knew there was a team."

Others like Scott, senior in psychology, simply happen upon the team by chance.

"I was driving by one day on the way to get cigarettes, and I saw them practicing," Scott said. "I had always played soccer all my life but quit in high school after I started smoking. I stopped smoking this summer because of the team — it's hard to play when you don't have the breath to run."

Additionally, some people don't get involved because they see the team as solely a greek body, Scott said.

"There's an attitude that the team is a sorority thing. But there's really a good mix of greeks and independents."

Part of the difficulty in getting players has been finding a coach. Heather Hamilton, who coached the team for several years, left Manhattan this fall, and the club has faced organizational problems in her absence.

"We've just been one semester without Heather Hamilton. She did so much with the team," West, sophomore undecided, said. "We've been struggling since she left. We're trying to deal with it and get organized, and we're hoping that we don't drop down to nothing."

West said playing as a club and not having a coach have hurt — but not destroyed — the team's recruiting efforts.

"We don't do enough recruiting, but we're trying to get a program going with a coach. Even though we don't have a varsity program, we can still recruit."

The lack of players has hurt the team in competition. In a match against Wichita State earlier in the season, K-State suffered while playing with a short roster.

"We played a game at Wichita State, but we didn't have all of the team show up, so we couldn't make substitutions or anything," Scott said. "We lost, but we didn't mind because we looked at it as a practice for Colorado."

Though K-State is done competing for the semester, spring competition will give the Wildcats time to regroup, find a coach and prove themselves again.

"Next semester, we'll play at the Big 8 Championship and a big indoor tournament in Nebraska that we won last year," West said. "We're just looking for a coach right now."

Students interested in joining the women's soccer team can call Tonia at 537-8396.

Jayhawks are contenders; Cats are on the bubble

So far this year, there have been some football teams, both at the college level and the pro level, that have been labeled "pretenders" and "contenders."

After viewing some of these teams' performances this weekend, I have come up with my own list.

First, the pretenders:

The Oklahoma Sooners — In many preseason polls, the Sooners were ranked at about No. 10. The big hype was that new coach Howard Schnellenberger would turn the program around, just like he did with Miami.

The only turning around that will happen in Norman will be the team turning toward the bottom half of the Big 8 standings.

With two pitiful losses to Colorado and Kansas, expect the Sooners to lose to K-State, Nebraska and possibly Oklahoma State and to finish fifth in the conference.

The Texas A&M Aggies — The Aggies are still pretending to be one of the Top 25 teams in the nation. After bad losses to Colorado and Texas Tech, the Aggies just barely got by Southern Methodist at home.

This past Saturday, they looked less than impressive defeating Baylor. But because of a weak schedule remaining (with the exception of Texas) the Aggies will end up with only three losses, remain a Top-25 team, go to a bowl and continue to fool everyone else in the nation.

The St. Louis Rams — This weekend's game against the San Francisco 49ers was supposed to be the big showdown for first place in the NFC West. The Rams were 5-1, and the 49ers were 4-2.

Give me a break. This was going to be as big as a showdown as Mike Tyson vs. Peter McNeely. If there is anyone out there that thinks the Rams are for real, you have to be high on something, and it's not the good stuff.

The Rams showed their real colors in a 44-10 loss. Expect no more than three or four more wins from the Rams this year and no appearance in the playoffs.

The contenders:

The Kansas Jayhawks — As much as it pains me to say this, the Jayhawks are proving they're a top team this year.

I can't explain it. I don't know if there is a big payoff scandal we don't know about or if they made a pact with the devil, but the Jayhawks are playing quality football.

After witnessing what I thought was the biggest fluke in college football history (KU over CU), I was still skeptical of the Jayhawks.

But coming back from 14 points down in the second half at Norman impressed me. Kansas has a legitimate shot at finishing the season at 10-1 and going to a nice bowl game.

The Northwestern Wildcats — Does anyone else besides me just love this story? I mean, here is a team that a year ago went 3-7-1, and now they're sitting at 7-0.

The Wildcats have really impressed me with road wins at Notre Dame and Michigan and a home thrashing of Wisconsin. This team will finish the season at 11-0, win the Rose Bowl and will have a legitimate plea for being the National Champion.

The Ohio Bobcats — Hey, they got the first win in more than a year — let's give them a little credit.

The Kansas City Chiefs — OK, I'm the first to admit, the Chiefs have surprised me this year. The only thing standing in the way of the Chiefs winning the AFC West is a week-14 showdown at Oakland.

If the Chiefs can get home-field advantage throughout the playoffs, they have a good chance of making it to the Super Bowl.

But don't get too excited, Chiefs fans. Kansas City is still a long way away from the 49ers and Cowboys in the race to be the best team in the NFL.

MEN'S AND WOMEN'S RUGBY

Clubs play in KC tournament

Shana Newell
staff writer

This weekend was not a good one for K-State fans.

While the K-State football team was being routed by Huskers in Lincoln, Neb., the K-State men's and women's rugby clubs were putting up a losing fight in Kansas City, Mo.

Three teams represented K-State at the Heart of America tournament last weekend at Lewis Field in Swope Park.

K-State's two men's teams and its women's squad each played two games on Saturday and a third on Sunday.

The men's A-side team faced the RAF team to begin K-State play in the tournament. RAF, short for Robke and Friends, consisted mostly of K-State alumni and all five Robke brothers. Some Wildcats chose to participate in the tournament as part of the Robke squad, including Ryan Robke, sophomore undecided.

Robke said he chose not to play with the Cats because of a commitment to a more important team.

"I firmly believe that I was committed to this team long before I ever started playing rugby, for the sake that they were my brothers," Robke said.

The RAF squad defeated the Cats 40-0.

K-State finished Saturday's games in a loss to the Jefferson City Rugby Club, 27-7.

On Sunday, the Cats found themselves playing the Springfield Rugby Club in a consolation match. Although K-State swept Springfield in September in two games, the Cats were unable to repeat that victory. Instead, the team dropped its third game on the weekend, 15-10.

Considering the obstacles facing them, the men's B-side team fared somewhat better than the A-side team. The squad had to scramble to round up players because of a lack of organization. Many players were unable to attend the tournament, and still others were unable to find where to play.

The B-side team faced Central Missouri State University in the first game. The Cats won a match against CMSU by forfeit in September but fell 40-0 Saturday.

In the second round, it took the field opposite the Johnson County Community College rugby team and lost again, 35-7.

But the tide turned on the final day of the tournament as the B-side squad defeated Missouri, 17-3.

It was a disappointing weekend for the men's teams, whose expectations were high before the tournament.

"We expected to finish in the top 10. Obviously, we didn't," Brandon Derks, junior in graphic design and club president, said.

"A lot of key players were unable to make it, and we had to put together a team that had never played together before."

Organization is the key for improvement, Derks said.

"We need to organize a bit better. A lot of the guys just got lost."

The men's teams were not alone in being short of players.

K-State's women's squad also attended the tournament without a few of its members.

The team finished third out of five in the tournament this year.

"We ended up going to the tournament short some players, so third place was a nice surprise," said Julie Leet, senior in hotel and restaurant management and public relations secretary for the club.

After losing to Northeast Missouri State University 20-0 in the first game, the Cats bounced back to shut out Kansas 31-0.

In Sunday's consolation game, the team found themselves once again playing Northeast. K-State emerged with a victory after defeating them 15-0.

Both teams will continue to play in the coming weeks. The men's team will travel to Kansas City Saturday to face Kansas City RFC, and the women's team plays host to the Tiny Tumbleweed Tournament November 4-5.

KUREGIAN BEATS NATION'S No. 5 PLAYER

K-State senior tennis player Karina Kuregian recorded the biggest win of her career, and one of the biggest victories in the history of K-State tennis Sunday at the Riviera All-America Championships.

Kuregian defeated Margie Lepsi of Tennessee in straight sets 6-3, 7-6 (7-5). Lepsi is the No. 5 singles player in the country.

Lepsi is the highest-ranked player Kuregian, ranked No. 14 in the country in singles, has ever defeated. She is also the highest-ranked player ever to be defeated by a K-State singles player.

"This is a great win," K-State coach Steve Bietau said of Kuregian's victory. "This is Karina's best win, the highest ranked win she's ever achieved."

"I think she could have played better, but to beat the No. 5-ranked player in the nation is significant."

Kuregian was defeated in the second round of the consolation tournament by Divya Merchant of Florida 6-1, 6-3. Merchant, ranked No. 15, went on to win the consolation tournament.

"She's had a difficult time this fall, and she's struggled to find confidence," Bietau said.

"This win will certainly go a long way in helping that, and it's a good step to take prior to Regionals."

The next tournament for the Wildcats is the Rolex Regional Championships in Salt Lake City, Utah. Play begins at the Regionals Nov. 8.

MIDWEST SPORTS BUYS OUT WILDCAT WEEKLY

Wildcat Weekly, K-State's first weekly sports magazine, closed its doors yesterday.

Midwest Sports Publications, publisher of Purple Pride, bought out Wildcat Weekly Monday afternoon. Wildcat Weekly publisher Jeff Grantham will join Midwest Sports as general executive.

"We've had ongoing talks about how to merge the two to make a better product for K-Staters," Tim Fitzgerald, editor of Purple Pride, said.

Wildcat Weekly subscribers will begin receiving Purple Pride next week, beginning with coverage of the University of Kansas football game, Fitzgerald said.

The buyout should allow Purple

Pride to expand its coverage of Wildcat sports, Fitzgerald said.

"Jeff's proven himself to be a very good advertising salesman. By incorporating more ads in Purple Pride, we will be able to expand the number of pages in some instances, and the product will be bigger."

"can't explain it. I don't know if there is a big payoff scandal we don't know about or if the Jayhawks made a pact with the devil, but the Jayhawks are playing quality football."

On the bubble:

The Notre Dame Fighting Irish — Just when I am about to unmask the Irish and show the world what frauds they are, they go out and beat a top-five team in Southern California. The Irish could finish the season at 9-2 and go to a high-dollar bowl.

On the other hand, they could finish the season at 6-5 and go to a high-dollar bowl.

The K-State Wildcats — Just because the Wildcats got blown away in Lincoln, Neb. doesn't mean they're not a Top-25 team. There are not too many teams that can go into Lincoln and pull out a win. Home games against Kansas, Colorado and Oklahoma will determine if the Cats are for real or just another top-25 impostor.

Anthrax still 'among the living' in '95

Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — Charlie Benante went through an identity crisis during the making of Anthrax's new record, "Stomp 442."

He found himself happily picking up the slack after guitarist Dan Spitz left the band because of creative conflicts. In fact, he had such a good time writing and playing guitar he found he had no desire to play the drums.

That was a problem — because he established his place in the band as the drummer.

"I was questioning what I was doing with just drums in general," Benante said.

"I didn't even know if I wanted to do this anymore, as far as drum playing, because I just felt that there was something missing — there was a void somewhere. I wasn't happy with what I used to do."

But inspiration was just around the corner, in the form of a side project.

"I put a little band together, me and two friends, and we would play Hüsker Dü songs. It was because of that — it got me excited again. I swear, from that day on, things just changed. I just approached these songs with so much more rhythm and just created more colors and everything in the songs. Now, I'm excited to play," he said.

He still loves guitar; he talked about being on a radio tour for two weeks and being without one.

"I felt like I had no pants on," said the soft-spoken, gentle-mannered Benante. "It was a very strange situation to be in."

Benante is credited with five guitar solos on the record and played some rhythm parts, or textures, as he calls them.

"As far as playing guitar goes on the record, I only dabbled in it," he said. "I just had things that I was doing that didn't really sound like Scott's style so he just said, 'Well, just play it.' So that's the way it was. It was kind of really comfortable in this sense."

Even though Benante is credited with writing music and band founder Scott Ian and singer John Bush are named as lyricists, Benante said the lines between the roles became blurred.

"I would bring in a song — Scott would sometimes modify it a little," he said. "The same with lyrics — John would be singing something, and I would just say, 'Why don't you do this?' It was one big collaboration, which it should be."

Anthrax always has railed against society's injustices and shortcomings, and "Stomp" is no different. Songs like "Random Acts" (based on the Long Island Rail Road murder case in which convicted killer Colin Ferguson defended himself) bemoan the decline of the nation and its justice system.

"At times, I just feel like something is gonna blow," he said. "I just feel like America is just one big Mount St. Helens waiting to just blow. People are very angry out there, for reasons that me and you probably wouldn't agree with."

"I'm so sick of this whole tax situation, I'm so sick of the homeless situation, everything — this whole O.J. situation. It's really hot out there right now, and I don't know if the temperature's cooling down."

"In a Zone," with its themes of frustration and self-destruction, hits close to home for Benante.

"We all kind of self-destruct every once in a while," he said. "Give me a month and a half, two months on the road and I begin to destruct. When you're on the road, it's such a great thing — some people lose sight of why they're out there in the first place."

When he's not on stage, the other hours of the day are draining, and he sometimes doesn't know what to do with himself.

"You live to play, but it goes so fast sometimes. I just wish I could just slow it down a bit," he said.

He had a good analogy for listeners when it comes to today's music and Anthrax's place in that world.

"In a world of microwave ovens, you shouldn't neglect listening to a conventional one," he said. "If you're true, then you're true and I'll see you at the show. If you're phony, then I won't see you."

► EDUCATION

Student teacher makes the switch

■ College senior adjusts to life teaching high-school students

Heather Stephany
staff reporter

This is the second in an occasional series highlighting the student teaching experience of a K-State student.

A month into her student teaching, Kena Tague, senior in English and secondary education, has completed the transition from taking notes to teaching class.

"It's a lot more comfortable and easy than I thought it would be in front of the kids," Tague said.

She said she wasn't sure if the students would accept her as a teacher right away but they have and treat her accordingly, Tague said.

"We may be pretty close in age, but college and high school are worlds apart — especially freshmen and sophomores," she said.

"They think I'm old, and I feel old," Tague said, laughing.

She is now teaching all five of Deloris Berland's English classes at Manhattan High School.

For the past three weeks, Tague has been teaching the sophomore English class. Last week, she began teaching advanced freshman English. Tague completed her transition Monday when she took over the three classes of advanced sophomore English.

"I write my own units, make up my own composition assignments and handouts, and assign grades," Tague said.

Tague has already written two units, she said. Her sophomore English class is working on "To Kill a Mockingbird," and her freshman advanced English class is studying "Romeo and Juliet."

On Oct. 17, after changing out of her school attire, Tague settled down at her kitchen table to begin planning a short story unit for the advanced sophomore English classes.

"The first thing is to pick out the stories to teach and make a rough plan for the unit," Tague said. "Right now, I think I am going to use a multiculturalism theme."

She said she asked other teachers for advice about what stories to use, but she had some of her own in mind also. Most of the stories the class will study come from the textbook the students use because a lot of photocopying would be needed to use her own material, Tague said.

The next step is to determine the basic activities that will be graded for each unit, she said. This includes composition assignments, student presentations and tests.

"I try to do as many different things as I can," Tague said. "I try to get them to stand in front of the room sometimes. I also use videos and tapes, and have them do group work."

For example, Tague said she played music from "Romeo and Juliet" during class when they were discussing the play.

The last part of planning a unit is outlining what work should be accomplished each week, Tague said.

"I make a real rough outline of how much to cover in a week, and then briefly describe what I want to do every day," she said.

After planning a rough outline for the unit, Tague said she tries to stick to it.

"Usually on Thursday, I look at the outline and plan what to do the next week," she said. "Then I turn in the outline for the week to my University supervisor."

Tague's University supervisor observes one class period every two weeks.

"She sits in back of the classroom and critiques me," she said. "She tells me what I need to work on and what she likes. She's really positive."

From her weekly plans, Tague said she develops her daily plans.

"About two days ahead of time I do a more in-depth breakdown of what to do with the time period for each class," she said.

MIKE WELCHANS/Collegian

Kena Tague, senior in English and secondary education, lectures during one of her first lessons in Deloris Berland's first-hour English class Monday morning at Manhattan High School.

Writing tests was tricky at first, Tague said.

"It's difficult when you are used to college tests to decide how much high-school sophomores should know," she said. "I mostly go on what I think they should know."

After being a part of the teaching environment for a while, Tague said she is surprised by the amount of extra work.

"The hours are a lot longer than people realize," she said.

Tague said she arrives at school around 7:30 a.m. and stays at school until about 4:30 or 5 every evening.

"There is so much paperwork," Tague said. "You have to be organized and stay on top of things. That's probably one of my weaknesses. I know what I need to work on now."

In addition to paperwork and faculty meetings, there are assignments to be graded.

"Last weekend, I spent all weekend grading," Tague said. "I had essays for one class and wanted to make really good comments."

Tague said grading the papers took a lot of time and she kept reminding herself that it was only work from one of her classes.

Despite all the paperwork, meetings and grading, Tague said she is enjoying her experience in the classroom.

"I love going to class everyday," she said. "I wish I could teach Shakespeare everyday. It's fun to teach something you love."

Tague said her time in front of the classroom is preparing her for the future.

"It's going by so fast," she said. "I feel much more prepared. I'm not quite ready for my own class, but I'm definitely getting the hang of it."

Lecture to focus on women in the Holocaust

Tonya Bobbitt
staff reporter

The treatment of women in the Holocaust will be the focus of a Faculty Lecture at 2 this afternoon in Union Forum Hall.

Lillian Kremer, associate professor in English, will be presenting the third Faculty Lecture, said Matt Jones, sophomore in business administration and Union Program Council Issues and Ideas committee chairperson.

Kremer teaches literature of the Holocaust for the English department. In addition, she is planning a course using Holocaust-related film that she said should be offered in spring 1997.

"The Holocaust involved the destruction of an entire people, Jewish people, through the use of modern technology, such as the gas chamber," Kremer said. "It was sanctioned by the government. It was a state-sponsored genocide."

The Holocaust is an essential topic of the 20th century because it affected how people thought about humanity, government and civilization, Kremer said.

Kremer will use three women's narratives, which are published stories, during her lecture.

The narratives discuss various events that happened in the Holocaust from a woman's perspective.

One narrative is about a woman who is a Holocaust survivor.

Another narrative is about a woman's experiences in a concentration camp and how her life is affected decades later. The final narrative is about World War II and the Holocaust.

People who study the Holocaust range from philosophers and psychologists to people who are in the performing arts, Kremer said.

"The Holocaust interests many different scholars and different genres in a wide variety of disciplines because many people have attempted to understand the Holocaust," Kremer said.

In addition to lecturing, Kremer has written a book about the Holocaust titled, "Witness Through the Imagination: The Holocaust in Jewish American Literature."

"My book is about the treatment of the Holocaust in Jewish American literature," Kremer said.

In November, Kremer will also be giving two lectures at the U.S. Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C. One lecture will be about women's Holocaust narratives, and the other will be about how the Holocaust is treated in American literature.

Kremer is working on an analysis of fiction by women portraying women's Holocaust experience. She will be looking at the theme of the work, the strategy of the writer and how the writing is put together.

"K-State has some incredible professors, and we want to give students a chance to hear them," Jones said. "This is our way of showcasing the talent and abilities that K-State has."

► TUTTLE CREEK RESERVOIR

Land donated for outdoor classroom

Karrin Thomas
staff reporter

A 250-acre track of land that overlooks Tuttle Creek Reservoir has been donated as an outdoor classroom for students in the Department of Horticulture, Forestry and Recreation Resources.

The Howe Natural Resource Education Center was donated to K-State by Eugene Howe and his wife in June 1993.

It will be like an extension of the classroom where students can put ideas into practical application, said Mark Morgan, associate professor of park resource management.

"Rather than talking about a design, we can actually go out and do it," he said.

The land had originally belonged to George W. and Jo E. Howe.

The University took over the deed to the property in April.

The property lies on two tracts of land on either side of the entrance road to the Blue River Hills Estate complex, which is about 15 miles north of Manhattan.

The land is undeveloped and covered with native prairie and natural hardwood forest, said Thomas Warner, chairman of the Department of Horticulture, Forestry and Recreation Services.

It is also home to deer, small mammals and many birds, including waterfowl, because the land lies next to the lake, he said.

The land will be used to teach field skills in park management, forestry and natural resources management classes, Warner said.

"This is an opportunity to get students out of the class and into the field," he said.

The department is planning to build nature trails and possibly an education center on the site in the next five to 10 years.

Warner said they are also in the process of developing a usage policy for the land, but it will primarily be used for teaching purposes, with possible open house days.

debt," said Linda Richter, professor in political science and developing nations.

Richter said the United States lobbied with the United Kingdom and France for reforms. However, unlike the other two countries, the United States did not pay its dues.

"Presidents Reagan and Bush both wanted out of the U.N., and they wanted to cut funding, but they learned the U.S. could not ignore the U.N.," Williams said.

There has been opposition to the United Nations since its creation. There were many people in President Franklin Roosevelt's time who believed the United States should deal only with domestic concerns.

Roosevelt had to convince Congress the United States had to enter into foreign policy.

"We have learned that we cannot live alone at peace, that our own well-being is dependent on the well-being of other nations far away," Roosevelt said.

President Clinton has faced the same opposition.

"Well, of course, the United States must be prepared to act alone when necessary, but we dare not ignore the benefits that coalitions bring to this nation," Clinton said at the UN50 charter ceremony in June.

Some of the animosity toward the United Nations by the U.S. public is due to the lack of knowledge concerning the United Nations, Williams said.

"We have not educated our people on our participation in the U.N., and this has resulted in the rumor that the U.N. is trying to take the world and operate as a world government," he said.

A local chapter in Manhattan is educating the public on the United States' involvement with the United Nations.

The Flint Hills chapter of the UNA/USA was founded in 1989.

Florence Schwab, the president of the local chapter of the United Nations Association/USA, said the purpose of the local chapters is not only to educate people about the United Nations but also to be a force for change with the United Nations.

The Flint Hills chapter has 83 members and hopes to keep growing, she said.

"We have members from other countries who are involved, but no student support," she said.

Schwab said she thought the United Nations needed to be more adaptable.

"The biggest way the U.N. has failed is with a complete new structuring of the U.N. to fit the 21st century," Schwab said.

The United Nations has six main bodies in its structure. These include the General Assembly, Security

Here is the structure of the United Nations important bodies and some sub-committees.

Council, Secretariat, Economic and Social Control, Trusteeship Council and International Court of Justice.

"It is the General Assembly that creates the other relative organization, such as the U.N. Children's Fund, U.N. University and the U.N. relief and works agency," Schwab said.

Schwab said she had heard members of the United Nations were examining the power of the Security Council and whether to allow the council to keep its veto privilege.

The council is responsible for maintaining international peace and security, and it is composed of 15 members, five of which are permanent. These include the United States, Russia, the United Kingdom, France and China.

The five permanent members can each veto a resolution alone, and for a resolution to pass through the Security Council, it must have the vote of all of the five permanent members.

The United Nations should not respond to every problem that people bring to its attention, Boutros Boutros-Ghali, the United Nations Secretary-General said in a fax interview.

"The United Nations cannot and should not take up every problem, but we are required to try to construct a realistic basis for international relations," Boutros-Ghali said.

The time has come for the world organization to fulfill its original purpose, he said.

"The common goal is peace, and the best way to achieve this is through cooperation," he said. Boutros-Ghali said the United States' membership in the United Nations is crucial to the United States.

"The U.N.-U.S. relationship may be one of the most important international relationships of the next century," Boutros-Ghali said. "Let us treat it with the seriousness, importance and care it deserves."

Ahmad Fawzi, deputy-spokesman for the Secretary-General, said in a telephone interview that one thing people in the world must remember is the nature of the problems of today are global, Fawzi said.

"Drug trafficking, the environment and diseases like AIDS are all cross-border problems. This is to say no one country is unaffected by these," he said.

Mark Parillo, associate professor in history, said the United Nations is struggling to adjust to a post-Cold War world community.

"The U.N. was a debate forum with two superpowers. Now, there is only one," he said.

Parillo said he is hopeful nations will see the benefits of collective action through the United Nations.

HENRY

unexcused.

Henry disputed the unexcused absence for the Senate retreat on the weekend of Sept. 9-10.

Students who ran for Senate seats in spring signed an agreement stating they would attend the Senate retreat and if they could not attend, the absence would be considered unexcused.

The Senate retreat is an orientation meeting for members of SGA. SGA members learn about the body and how to communicate with each other during the retreat.

Henry said he signed the agreement, but said he did not know at the time he signed it the retreat would be out of town. He said he had to work that weekend and would not be able to attend the meeting.

Henry is a bartender, and a majority of his income is made on weekends. He said not working would have imposed a financial burden on him.

"When I agreed to attend retreat, I did not know it would cost me that much money," he said. "I had electric bills and things of that nature I had to pay."

Henry said Potter had been inconsistent on his decisions to excuse people from the retreat because he had excused the Faculty Senate representatives from the retreat.

Potter said the Faculty Senate representatives had not been required to sign the agreement to attend the retreat.

Potter said he was not trying to make an example of Henry but had to enforce the rules in the by-laws. Potter said there were other senators who had to leave the retreat early, but they made an effort to attend and only were counted as having one-third absences.

Trent LeDoux, committee member, said the by-laws clearly said three unexcused absences were grounds for impeachment.

"I think we set a dangerous precedent if we start deciding what rules to follow, when to follow the rules and how to follow the rules," he said. "If I wanted to be humane, I would choose not to do this, but the by-laws say three unexcused absences are grounds for impeachment."

LeDoux said personal feelings should not be a factor in the committee's decision.

"If we could make this decision based on personal feelings, it would be an easy no vote for me, but my orders are clear in the constitution," he said.

"I swore to uphold this and serve and protect it, not defend it when I felt good about it."

Arthur Fink, committee member, said he thought Henry should have been excused from the retreat to work.

"The way I see it, we are a check on the chair. If I would have been in the chairperson's shoes, I would have excused him. For this reason, I will not vote for this motion," he said.

If the committee had found there were grounds to impeach, it would have sponsored a bill of impeachment. Senate would have voted on whether to impeach.

If Senate would have voted to impeach a senator, Student Tribunal would have decided if the senator should have been removed from Senate.

Henry said he felt vindicated that the committee voted not to sponsor the legislation, and he said he was eager to get back to serving students.

Potter said he felt the committee had misunderstood its duty and had taken away Senate's opportunity to discuss the issue.

He said the committee threw the SGA constitution and by-laws out the window with its decision.

"The committee has made it apparent that anyone who wants to can make an excuse to suspend the constitution and the by-laws," he said.

Potter said that because of the committee's decision, Senate has no control over its absence policy, which could hurt student representation.

"If the committee chooses not to enforce the policy, it means students won't be represented on the floor, and if students don't have a say on issues, there is no need for Student Senate," Potter said.

He said he expected more absences at the Senate meeting Thursday because of the committee's decision.

3 football players arrested for battery

Dan Lewerenz
sports editor

Three K-State football players, including two starters, were arrested Tuesday evening in connection with the incident that took place Aug. 20 in the 1600 block of Leavenworth as reported in the Collegian Sept. 19.

Starters defensive end Nyle Wiren, linebacker Percell Gaskins and backup quarterback Brian Kavanagh each were charged with two counts of battery, one count of criminal damage to property, criminal trespass, conspiracy to commit battery and cruelty to animals.

All of the charges are misdemeanors. A court date has been set for Nov. 1 at 1 p.m.

"I have no comment on anything at this point," Kavanagh said. Wiren and Gaskins were unavailable for comment.

K-State football coach Bill Snyder said through Sports Information Director Ben Boyle he had no comment, and no press conference was scheduled at this time. Snyder also had no comment as to whether the players charged would still participate in the K-State-KU game Saturday.

Though several other individuals may have been involved in the incident, Riley County Attorney Bill Kennedy said these were the only individuals for whom there was enough information to make arrests.

"We take them one at a time," Kennedy said. However, Kennedy did not rule out the possibility of further arrests if more evidence becomes available.

"That depends on the evidence that comes forward," Captain Steven French of the Riley County Police Department said though there were others at the scene, they could not be positively tied to the charges.

Wiren

"Those were the only three that we could positively identify as being in the house," French said. "There were others that were identified that were outside the house, and there may have been others in the house who we could not positively identify."

Matt, one of the victims, who asked that his last name not be used, said he was glad the arrests have been made, but he wishes more had been done.

"I am glad to see that action is finally being taken," Matt said. "However, I am disappointed that of the 10 to 15 men in the house that morning, only three have been arrested."

Jim Smith, who owns the house where the attack took place, said he wrote Snyder in hopes that the incident had been addressed.

"I told the coach that the thing that really bothers me most was the dog," Smith said.

"I wrote a letter to Coach Snyder and mailed it about last Friday (Oct. 13), just to let him know that I believe he and his staff don't condone this type of behavior. I really feel that way, and I like to think that he runs a clean program."

"The kids probably thought they were just taking care of one of their buddies, but they should have thought about it a bit," Smith said.

Smith said he was contacted by

► CITY COMMISSION

Mall owners may start paying rent

Nikola Zytow
staff reporter

Four of the five city commissioners voted Tuesday night to request the owners of the Manhattan Town Center begin paying mall rent in 1997.

In a previous commission meeting, Forest City, the mall management company, proposed the outstanding Manhattan mall industrial revenue bonds be purchased from the current bond holder and remarketed.

The commission said if it were to let Forest City remarket the bonds, it would want to make significant revisions to the landlease agreement. One of the revisions suggested was to make mall owners start paying their own rent.

The bonds were issued to build the mall, which opened in 1987. The mall's rent, $185,000 per year, is being paid by the city. It comes out of the city's general fund.

The city owns the land the mall is on, as well as the parking lot. The city agreed to pay the mall's rent in a 1992 landlease agreement because the mall was having a cash-flow problem. The

Investigation focuses on scholarship student

Claudette Riley
staff writer

The investigation of a possible aggravated assault and battery involving scholarship house students has not reached a conclusion.

Two Smurthwaite scholarship house students were celebrating a birthday last Sunday night with friends from the house.

According to police reports, the women stopped at their brother house, the Smith Scholarship House. A member of the men's scholarship house became upset and pressed what looked like a gun against the head of one woman. He then turned, pointed the gun at the other woman and shot the birthday hat off her head.

The man was restrained by other men in the house. Police later said that the gun used was a B.B. or pellet gun. But because the projectile fired could cause bodily injury, the man could be charged with aggravated assault.

The investigation, under Captain Steven French of Riley County Police, is ongoing.

Police said a separate instance of battery is also being investigated.

Representatives of Smurthwaite and Smith scholarship houses have no comment.

Shah Hasan, assistant director for housing and dining services, said the situation has been referred to the Dean of Student Life office.

"The police are investigating. And pending the outcome of that, we really have no firm comments to make," Hasan said. "What we know is what is available in the public record."

Mayor raises U.N. flag, honors 50th anniversary

Brent Johnson
staff reporter

Tuesday morning, it wasn't the custodian who raised the flags at City Hall. It was Mayor Edith Stunkel.

Stunkel, along with Florence Schwab, president of the Flint Hills chapter of the United Nations Association-USA, raised the U.N. flag to commemorate the United Nation's 50th anniversary.

"I'm overcome with awe on how it feels to raise the U.N. flag," Stunkel said. "I'm honored to be the mayor in the year of the 50th anniversary of the U.N."

Stunkel said the United Nations was a family of nations.

"Just like a normal family, each member needs to work together for a common good," she said.

The ceremony was made up of the girls choir from Manhattan High School, representatives from the local U.N. chapter and five foreign exchange students.

The local U.N. chapter serves many purposes for the community, Schwab said.

U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno claps during the recognition of special guests moments before delivering the 103rd Landon Lecture Tuesday evening at Bramlage Coliseum.

AMERICAN YOUTH

■ Isolation, violence result of poor support system

Nicole Kirby
staff reporter

Too many of America's youth are afraid, alone and angry, U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno said.

Reno said children in trouble tell her if they only had someone to talk with, their crimes could have been prevented.

"We must confront together a crisis in our country — a crisis of isolation over our children," Reno said during the Landon Lecture Tuesday night.

About 3,750 people attended Reno's lecture about the issues of youth violence and isolation.

Reno cited a study that found a dramatic increase in youth violence during the last decade, especially in the 14- to 17-year-old age group.

"About half are at serious or moderate risk of harming their life chances," Reno said.

Youth violence and isolation are a result of some children's lack of adult support, she said.

Reno advocated programs that build trust in America's police force and involved it in the community.

"Community policing is a valuable tool," Reno said.

In order to help children, America must enforce laws against violence, Reno said.

"We must love them enough to let them know that we will not give up on them, but there will be fast, firm and certain punishment if they hurt others," she said.

Reno also advocated providing attractive and educational after-school programs, because the highest rate of violence is after school.

The Department of Justice supports programs that bring adults together with kids who need support and guidance, she said.

PROTESTERS PICKET SPEECH

Sarah Lunday
campus editor

About 10 protesters with Fred Phelps lined up outside Bramlage Coliseum and welcomed people to U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno's Landon Lecture Tuesday night.

"I think he's just ignorant," Bettine Rezac, junior in industrial engineering, said of Phelps and his hatred of homosexuals.

Phelps is wrong to say God hates homosexuals, instead God hates the sin, Rezac said.

The picketers held signs that said "God hates fags," "AIDS cures fags" and a graphic sign picturing two individuals in compromising positions.

"Mentoring can make a difference," Reno said.

Some members of the audience disagreed with Reno's proposed solutions to the problems.

"She seemed to think that all those programs are going to fix the problem, but really the problem is that families are deteriorating," Terry Pritchett, senior in missions at Manhattan Christian College, said.

Reno also said education is key

"He's even got little kids out there," Rezac said.

Nine-year-old Joshua Phelps said he did not really know who Reno was.

"Who is she?" he said, but then remembered she was the speaker at Bramlage.

The boy said his family and his grandpa, Fred Phelps, taught him about the Bible.

"I believe in the Bible," he said.

Joshua Phelps also said he has always attended Phelps Westboro Baptist Church in Topeka.

to eliminating youth violence.

"We must make sure that we provide not just child care, but education for those formative years," she said.

Reno said the years from 0 to 3 were very critical in a child's development, and those children should be targeted as well as school-age children.

"If we can teach our children

LIFE OF MANHATTAN FOUNDER PORTRAYED IN FILM DOCUMENTARY

The Riley County Historical Society will present a movie about the life of one of the founders of Manhattan at 2 p.m. Sunday in the Riley County Historical Museum.

"Room for All His Energies," is an hour-long documentary film with some reenactments of parts of Isaac Goodnow's life. Admission is free.

Parts of the movie were filmed at the Goodnow House Museum in Manhattan, said Barbara Poresky, exhibit designer for the Riley County Historical Society. Goodnow arrived in Manhattan in 1855.

He was a member of the New England Emigrant Aid Society, a group of abolitionists whose purpose was to send people to Kansas so they could vote for it to be admitted to the Union as a free state.

Goodnow, who had been a teacher before coming to Manhattan, was interested in the importance of education, Poresky said.

He was a founder of Bluemont College, which later became K-State, and was a state representative who helped locate the land-grant university in Manhattan under the Morrill Act of 1862.

The Riley County Historical Museum is at 2309 Claflin Ave. The Goodnow House Museum, which is next to the Historical Museum, will be open for visitors before or after the film.

KANSAS TRIBAL CASINO APPROVED BY U.S. DEPARTMENT OF INTERIOR

HORTON (AP) — The Sac and Fox Tribe has been given approval by the U.S. Department of Interior to build a casino on its land on U.S. Highway 75 west of Horton.

The compact will become official upon publication in the Federal Register, probably this week, Thomas Sweeney, an Interior Department spokesman, said.

It was approved late last week.

"The tribe now is free to commence its gaming operation once it has financing and a facility," said Paul Alexander, the Sac and Fox general counsel.

Tribal officials could not be reached for comment. Alexander said the Sac and Fox wanted to move as quickly as possible on the casino and would select a management contract or a consulting agreement with a professional gaming firm.

The Sac and Fox compact was the last of four approved for tribes in northeast Kansas. The Iowa, Kickapoo and Prairie Band Potawatomi tribes received state and federal approval of their compacts in the summer.

The site, tribal officials said, is on the east side of U.S. 75 about two miles north of its intersection with Kansas Highway 20. The site is close to the Kickapoo Reservation.

HOSTAGE TAKEN AT WAL-MART

WICHITA (AP) — A distraught man with a file knife held an employee hostage inside a Wal-Mart store for nearly 90 minutes before releasing him unharmed, police said.

About 100 employees and customers evacuated the store following a public address system announcement asking them to do so during the noon hour Tuesday.

The Wichita Police Department's Special Weapons and Tactics Team and a police hostage negotiator were called to the scene.

The suspect demanded beer, cigarettes and an opportunity to urinate, police Capt. Jim Carney said.

The employee eventually was released, and the man was taken into custody.

Carney refused to say how the man was taken into custody, but witnesses said the suspect appeared woozy as he was placed in a patrol car following his arrest.

GIRL SURVIVES BEAR ATTACK

MONROE, Wash. (AP) — A 300-pound black bear attacked a 14-year-old girl playing outside her home, but the girl survived by playing dead.

Sage Klevjer suffered bites in her left thigh and right calf Sunday afternoon before the bear walked away.

"She was very, very lucky," said Jan Jorgensen, a spokeswoman for the Snohomish County sheriff's department. "She'd been taught if anything like that happened, to go limp — to play dead."

Klevjer's 13-year-old foster brother, who had been outside at the time, ran to the house for help and was unharmed, Jorgensen said.

The girl was treated at Valley General Hospital in Monroe and sent home.

State Department of Fish and Wildlife agents tracked the bear with hounds and killed it.

A veterinarian planned to examine the animal.

Decision jeopardizes student representation

If the attendance policy can not be enforced and senators do not attend meetings, students are not being represented.

The Student Senate Operations Standing Committee has not only tripped over its own policies, but it has failed to protect the student body's representation in Senate.

The Senate Operations Committee's decision not to sponsor a bill of impeachment against an arts and sciences senator violated the Student Governing Association's Constitution and By-Laws.

The committee is supposed to decide if there are grounds for impeachment of a senator — nothing more.

The Operations Committee only collects the evidence; it is not supposed to rule on evidence.

Michael Henry, arts and sciences senator, has received three unexcused absences from Senate meetings.

As stated in SGA's By-Laws in Section five C, "Any student senator who misses three Student Senate meetings during one term of office will automatically be considered for impeachment by Student Senate, unless excused by the Chairperson of Student Senate."

This is where the wrong turn was made by the committee in the process of impeachment.

The only body intended to rule on any evidence is Student Tribunal.

The committee's out-of-order decision has also weakened the absence policy of Senate.

Granted, not every senator will now start skipping meetings, but anything that jeopardizes students' representation in Senate is wrong.

If the attendance policy can not be enforced and senators do not attend meetings, students are not being represented.

To be fair and just to the process and the K-State students, a bill of impeachment needs to be written by a senator and sent to the Operations Committee.

This time, the committee needs to stay within its responsibilities for the sake of due process.

Spoon-fed entertainment overshadows literacy

Reading is both a pleasure and privilege. When one reads good writing, whatever of the genre, the mind is expanded in regards to human nature, history and countless aspects of life, both present and past.

To read, as well as to comprehend, is one of the great privileges to members of an educated society.

Regardless of ethnic heritage and social class, writing expresses issues of race and everyday strife on a basis of equality by conveying life from a human standpoint.

There are two types of literate people.

The first is the definition accepted by society, as it appears in the Second College Edition of the American Heritage Dictionary: Someone who can read and write.

The second, which isn't considered in statistics, is as follows: A well-informed, educated person.

Our literature reflects our society. We have two sides of the coin — literature that is remembered and studied for content, and that which endures as entertainment.

Just as authors like John Grisham exist today, 100 years ago there was a type of story labeled as a Penny-dreadful, which exploited, not to mention fictionalized, the lives of Western heroes.

When it comes to reading for pleasure, the common excuse many people cite is they don't have the time to read for enjoyment or enlightenment.

This is particularly true in college, when a class load, activities and work take the majority of the day and night.

This is where Hollywood enters. Often, when a book hits the bestseller list, people wait for the movie to be released.

It is ironic that when books are made into movies, the most frequent complaint is the movie wasn't like the book at all, nor was it as good. When a true novel is translated onto screen, it loses much of the meaning in its message.

Roland Joffé, the man behind the movie "The Scarlet Letter," is one such individual who has taken a piece of literature and attempted to turn it into a story an audience of the 1990s can appreciate.

In doing so, however, he has taken Nathaniel Hawthorne's masterpiece and statement of Puritan society and left it devoid of any message.

Granted, the first reading of "The Scarlet Letter" is a little slow, but that doesn't give anyone the creative license to spice it up.

Joffé does so anyway, putting in a hot sex scene on a grain pile between the main character, Hester Prynne, and the Reverend Dimmesdale.

He even adds an attempted rape on Prynne by a colonist.

There's also plenty of violence, with scalping and a rescue by the Iroquois in the end.

In short, Joffé broke a literary rule, which is to show, not tell.

The significance within the actual book is that it was a statement of the ills of Puritan society and its taboos, not a marketing vehicle.

The book has a working perception of sin; the movie disregards any notion of sin and goes straight for what appeals to a society hooked on overnight bestsellers, that being a quick sensory fix of skin and blood.

It is obvious from movies such as "The Scarlet Letter" that various individuals in Hollywood wish to make a statement upon the current standing of society's morals.

It also attempts to illustrate the ills of the Puritans' lifestyles.

Joffé didn't accomplish this, but he did make a rather accurate statement about the state of our cinema as well as our literacy rate.

We are caught between two standards — being shown something and having the satisfaction of interpreting literature and cinema for ourselves.

The cinematic edition of "The Scarlet Letter" sacrifices everything literary about the story and gives the audience something simple, which is sex and violence, and leaves little to discover for one's self.

The message and statement within the novel lets the reader soak in the writing and have the thrill of discovery.

Becoming truly literate means taking the time to figure things out.

Relying on spoon-fed entertainment slows the pace of discovering, or in some cases rediscovering, our true intellects.

Instead of buying the Cliff's Notes when reading an assignment in any humanities and literature elective, read it yourself and try putting the puzzle together.

We discover things by teaching ourselves, and the quick-paced action and writing that has a standard once prevalent in society has left us artistically blind.

► POSITIVE ROLE MODELS

Editor,

The sports media has been hard at work lately.

Have they been covering games and press conferences?

No.

Rather, they have been covering court proceedings, brawls and police reports.

However, among the O.J. Simpsons, Lawrence Phillips' and Warren Moons of the world, there are intelligent, caring athletes who will take time to help people and do what they can to make our society a little better place to live.

On Oct. 19, the students of Junction City High School were given the opportunity to interact with some of K-State's finest athletes and exchange concerns and advice about their futures.

Tyson Schwiager, Monty Spiller, Mike Lawrence, "Toie" Young, Belinda Hope and Deke Gibson attended an assembly organized by student teacher Kristi Depew, a collegiate volleyball player at the University of Missouri-Kansas City.

The event was intended to make the high school students aware of the choices they have in their lives. Also, for a change, they heard this advice from people who faced the same struggles many of the students in attendance face, instead of a psychologist from White Picket Fence, America.

Gibson, a former member of a gang in his hometown of Denver, spoke straightforwardly about what gangs do to young lives.

He told students about three of his friends who are now dead due to gang violence and how education gave him a way out of that lifestyle.

Lawrence followed suit by actually bringing kids to the front of the auditorium where the students spoke about their problems on a one-on-one basis with Schwiager and Gibson.

At times, the conversation about gangs became a little (not very), but in the end, it appeared to be constructive.

Young and Hope then addressed the female students in the audience, telling them of the obstacles they were forced to overcome as athletes as well as students.

Some of the female students expressed concerns and questions about the problems women face today, such as teen pregnancy and sexism. The questions were addressed quickly and with compassion.

Although some of the students seemed indifferent about the whole thing, several students with serious problems — both at home and at school — were reached with an important message delivered by all of the student athletes at the program.

If you can believe in yourself and are willing to work hard, no one — no matter how hard they try — can keep you from your goals.

Only time will tell if this assembly was truly effective; however, it does prove that K-State has outstanding student athletes in its midst. If it weren't for this letter, they would go unrecognized.

The strangest absences from this assembly were not students, teachers or administrators — but the media.

While the media has time to camp out at the Riley County Police Department, waiting for the next wheelbarrow full of dirt to be emptied, apparently they don't have time to cover athletes doing positive things off the field.

Don't fear aging —

Acceptance breeds rewarding attitude

A woman in one of my classes told me the other day she was turning 20 this weekend.

I congratulated her on the event, and she told me she was kind of upset and sad because her youth was through and it was all downhill from here.

I waited for her to smile and say she was kidding, but she never did.

Good Lord, is this what we've become? If 20 is downhill, does that make 15 middle-aged?

I know society at large says women should be eternally young and perky, but the reality is that it just doesn't happen in everyone without surgical help. There's a certain beauty people attain when they get older I would compare it to a road map, but I'd offend someone.

Men get distinguished, and women get character — I'd take Lauren Bacall over Kate Moss any day. Kate is a blank canvas; Lauren is the finished portrait.

What's wrong with getting older and growing up? Is achieving wisdom and life knowledge such a bad thing?

Apparently, if it involves wrinkles, it is. We can't all be young forever, but it shouldn't be a curse and the end of life as we know it.

After much thought, I decided I don't want to be a teen-ager again. I don't really want to be a child again. The thought of peaking at 17 really bothers me.

As my mother will tell you, I spent my whole childhood trying to grow up. I'm here, and I plan to enjoy it now.

Adulthood is where we spend the majority of our lives. We should learn to deal with the fact of getting older. I'm kind of looking forward to it. I remember my parents in their 20s, and they were a mess. Once everyone got a little older, life was much easier.

I do not pine for the days of high school. To be honest, I didn't really enjoy it that much. I wasn't homecoming queen, I wasn't head cheerleader, I wasn't even the most popular (I did win weirdest wardrobe at Grad Night). On the whole, there's not a whole heck of a lot in that time for me to go back to.

Just to make sure I wasn't the only one who thought high school was a crock, socially, I polled a few people. Some mentioned they can't drink all night and still function like they used to. A couple mentioned they had more money back then, and a few missed having someone else to cook for them. But, on the whole, no one missed the day-to-day basis of high school.

"I want to go back and tell off my prom date, but other than that, no, I don't miss high school," one woman said.

Are there any good things about getting older?

According to a married friend of mine in his mid-30s, the sex gets better as you get older.

If that's not incentive, I don't know what is.

He also said giving advice to punk kids who won't understand it until much later is a lot of fun.

I learned about getting older from the best. My grandmother was the goddess of aging gracefully. She had five kids and died at the ripe old age of 79 with all five of those kids with her. She survived four wars and one husband, and she could yell in two different languages.

She also had a zillion grand and great-grandchildren, and I was the lucky one who got to live with her for two months before she passed away. Gram taught me more about life than Forrest Gump's mama on her best day.

The big one — age happens, use plenty of moisturizer and live with it. Not earth-shattering, but it works for me.

Needless suffering

An average of 85 percent of men and 68 percent of women who reported having one or more headaches in the prior year had never consulted a physician about their headaches. These facts are consistent with the results of a recent national survey of physicians that showed the typical migraine sufferer waits an average of 3 1/2 years before consulting a doctor for treatment of the headaches.

Persistent and severe head pain could be a sign of more than just your average headache. You could be suffering from migraines.

A recent study done by the National Headache Foundation showed that college-age people are the ones who are most likely to suffer from migraines.

Art Rathbun, counselor at University Counseling Services at Lafene Health Center, said he has seen an increase in the number of students who have been diagnosed with migraines during the past six or seven years.

Migraines are characterized by severe, recurrent pain, usually on one side of the head and usually accompanied by nausea, vomiting or sensitivity to sight and sound. On average, they can last from four to 72 hours.

Doctors aren't sure exactly what causes a migraine.

There is speculation that there are several causes, Brenda Rowe, a registered nurse at Memorial Hospital, said.

Such causes could be caffeine, stress, hormonal problems, certain medications and some foods.

"They can't know what causes migraines, but they have good ideas," Rowe said.

Rowe said it is known that women are more likely than men to suffer from migraines. Heredity also plays a big factor.

"If there is a family history, you can count on seeing it in the children," she said.

Rathbun helps migraine sufferers by using bio feedback.

Rathbun said bio feedback assists people in stress management.

"It's usually only one component in helping people deal with migraines," he said.

While physicians are the ones who prescribe medications, Rathbun focuses on the patient's diet, relaxation training and coping skills.

"We try to help people learn how to manage the stressors in their lives and kind of smooth out the wrinkles in life," he said.

Migraines are most likely to happen after someone has already dealt with something stressful in their lives.

"Migraines are more likely to happen after a big test," he said.

Some of the methods of relaxation training Rathbun said he uses in bio feedback are guided imagery, developing your own internal images and meditation.

But he said there really is no clear-cut way to treat every person's migraine.

"People can have very severe symptoms, but the symptoms are very people-specific," he said.

Rathbun said he deals with preventing migraines, but people should talk to a physician if they have one.

"By the time you're getting the migraine, medication is the way to go," he said.

Dr. Joseph M. Stein, a board-certified neurologist at the Cotton-O'Neil Clinic in Topeka, also said bio feedback is helpful.

"You have to have people to know how to do it," he said.

Stein said to treat people for migraines, you have to know what's going on in their lives.

"We look at the whole person — their stress or use of alcohol," he said. "Not all treatments merit medication."

There are two types of treatments: symptomatic, which treats the actual migraine, and prophylactic, which helps to prevent the migraine.

The biggest advance on the side of symptomatic treatment is Imitrex, an injection that doctors can teach patients to give themselves, Stein said.

"It's useful for about 70 percent of people with migraines," he said. "It was a big advancement when it works. It's wonderful."

One drawback to the shot, Stein said, is the cost. It's about $35 per shot.

But, he said, if you need it once a month, it's cheaper than going to the emergency room at the hospital.

Another positive aspect of this particular drug, he said, is that it is not a narcotic, so it does not make the user drowsy.

"The main thing to avoid is the excessive use of narcotics," he said.

Stein said prophylactic treatments involve taking medicine every day.

"They cut down on the frequency and severity of the migraines," he said.

In this type of treatment, there are Beta Blockers, which work on the sympathetic nervous system.

Propranolol is the most common of these types, he said.

Imitrex has recently become available in pill form, but Stein said it does not work as fast as the injection.

Billie Reuss, junior in architectural engineering, said her migraines are at their worst during allergy season. "It creeps up on you," Reuss said. "It will start with a slight headache through the temples and then just get worse."

Reuss said she has traced her migraines to allergic reactions of certain foods.

"It took a little while to figure out what causes them. I developed an allergy for food that I've been eating all my life," she said.

"Finally, after three or four complete meltdowns, we figured out what foods it was. Now I avoid them."

Reuss said her migraines can last anywhere from six hours to two days.

"There is not much of anything I can do about them," she said. "I curl up and sleep."

Stein said migraines are a tremendous health problem in the United States. "Seventeen percent of women and nine percent of men will suffer from a migraine sometime in their lifetime," he said.

The majority of people who get headaches treat it themselves, Stein said.

"That can be good, and it can be bad," he said. "But if a person has a headache problem, it is a good idea to see some kind of specialist."

Everyone should understand the severity of the problem with migraines, because it could potentially affect everyone, Stein said.

"There has to be an understanding that money used in treatment of migraines is money well-invested."

Common migraine triggers

- ★ Environmental changes, including changes in atmospheric pressure or temperature as well as cigarette smoke, bright lights, and loud noises — even music.
- ★ Hormonal changes, associated with birth-control pills or menstrual cycles.
- ★ Motion from riding bikes or cars, eyestrain, irregular workouts or even a lack of exercise.
- ★ Certain medications, including over-the-counter pain relievers and analgesics, such as aspirin. (Many of these medications also contain caffeine, a known migraine trigger.)
- ★ Irregular sleep or insufficient sleep.
- ★ Dietary factors, such as skipping meals, dieting and consuming foods and beverages with caffeine, alcohol, MSG or nitrates.

K-State junior linebacker DeShawn Fogle is expected to play Saturday against No. 6 KU on Saturday, Coach Snyder said at his Tuesday press conference. Fogle was carried off the field on a stretcher in the fourth quarter of the Wildcats' 49-25 loss to Nebraska on Saturday with neck pain.

THURSDAY

Read the Collegian for results of the K-State volleyball team's match in Ames, Iowa, against Iowa State.

K-State should follow example set by Huskers

I want what they have. I want to be like a Nebraska Cornhusker.

The football atmosphere here at K-State is good; so are the players and the program.

But at Nebraska, the atmosphere is great, and so are the players, and so is the program.

So, at K-State, let's stand up and take notice of where Nebraska has gone right and just how K-State can learn from that example.

Let's start with the atmosphere. No other town is as devoted and focused on one sport and one goal. Each and every thing that takes place on a Lincoln game-day Saturday revolves around the mighty Cornhusker football team, all of which carries over into the stands.

Nebraska's Memorial Stadium has been called a "Sea of Red," and rightfully so. With 76,000 Cornhusker fans faithfully packed into Memorial Stadium for each and every Nebraska game, the Cornhuskers have a decided advantage each and every game. No one leaves early, no one sits, and no one is quiet. Imagine Arrowhead Stadium filled with college students, and that's pretty much Nebraska's Memorial Stadium.

But Nebraska could not have all of this if it weren't for its players. On Saturday, the Cornhuskers proved to K-State fans across the country why they are the defending national champions and the No. 2-ranked team in the country. The Nebraska players were bigger, stronger and quicker than their K-State counterparts, and they beat K-State in every aspect of the game.

The second-string Cornhuskers were at least as good as the K-State first-stringers, and no number of injuries or losses can hurt Nebraska's chances.

Success breeds more success, and because of this, Nebraska will not only continue to win this year, but for years to come. This is the idea K-State needs to instill.

It took Nebraska a long time to build up its program to this point, so K-State fans must be patient. But they shouldn't settle and must instead set lofty goals. Nebraska has all this because it wins, has always won and will continue to win, all with the help of its fans.

Sure, there is only one Lincoln, but there is no reason Manhattan cannot make a name for itself. Imagine a purple-packed KSU Stadium, with 40,000 screaming Wildcat faithful. That alone will help the recruitment process and building the Wildcat program up to where it should be.

Besides, if Lincoln can build its "Sea of Red," why can't Manhattan be a "Purple Paradise?"

Cats set their sights on the Big 8 title

Dan Lowerenz
sports editor

If you're looking for a sure-fire prediction on how the K-State women's basketball team will fare this year, Coach Brian Agler may not be the best source.

"I'll tell you what I told our team," Agler said. "I said 'We have the capability to finish first in the conference this year. We could also finish last.' It's just up to the team to do it."

But if preseason drills and practices are any indication, the Wildcats have come a long way.

"We've got a new rule this year where we're allowed to work the ladies two hours a week in groups of three or less, so we've had a chance to see everybody on the court," Agler said.

"This has been a big advantage for us. On defense, it's helped us with the help defense we play, and certainly with the motion offense. Our first week or two of practice, we used to spend a lot of time going 2-on-0, 3-on-0, and we've had the ability to get a lot of these fundamentals in before practice. So we're going to be somewhat ahead."

Sophomore point guard Amanda Chamberlain said that the summer and fall sessions have helped the team gel better now that the regular practice season has started.

"With that new rule where over the summer the coach can work with three people at a time, we're leaps and bounds ahead of last year," Chamberlain said. "We're all thinking about things so much more that we're coming together sooner."

"It's great," she said.

No matter how hard the Cats practice, they will have to replace their top scorer and rebounder, Shanelle Stires. But Agler said that he expects several players to step in and fill the void.

"I don't expect any one person to replace Shanelle," Agler said.

"But I really think our new people will branch out for us, and I look for people like Brit Jacobson and Missy Decker to really step forward for us.

"I think we're going to be more balanced in our scoring. And we'll probably be a little taller than last year. But we're still not as big as what we'll be playing in the conference. But at the same time, we're going to have an added quickness among our post players."

Among the players Agler said he expects to contribute early are community college transfers Carrie Ragar and Jenny Koester from Moberly Community College in Missouri and Kayla Hester from Seward County Community College.

"Carrie Ragar was an all-American in junior college, and she's a really aggressive offensive player. Kayla Hester was first-team all-conference and is a lot like Shanelle, with that same versatility — she can spot up and score from the 3-point line and she can score in the post. Jenny Koester ranks up there with Brit and Amanda as one of our top athletes with her quickness and her ability at 3-point range."

And with the Cats' pre-conference schedule, they may need contributions from their newcomers early.

The Cats play several teams who received postseason invitations last year, including recent Final Four contender Southwest Missouri State.

"We've got Ohio University coming in, Memphis, Grambling, Southwest Missouri in the first round in Puerto Rico, Northwestern. I just think that to get really good, you have to play the best," Agler said.

With four returning starters, productive returners and a tough per-conference schedule, Agler said he thinks the Cats will be prepared for a run at the Big 8 title in the conference's final year.

"I don't think there's any question. We put ourselves in position to finish third in the conference last year — if we had finished the

SHANE KEYSER/Collegian

Kristy Thomas and Missy Decker work on an offensive play for the K-State women's basketball team. Play starts for the team next month.

season by beating Missouri and Colorado, we'd have finished third. We just have to get things done," Agler said.

Decker said K-State's personnel may not be the best on paper, but they have the tools to surprise some people in the conference.

"We're obviously not the tallest team in the Big 8," Decker said, "and we're probably not the most talented. But we have the tools, and I think we'll show that we can play with the teams that are the tallest and most talented."

Chamberlain said players will step up and make a difference.

"We're going to have to have people step up. But that's going to happen, because we have some real competitors on this team."

Pass protection worked on heading into KU game

Ryan O'Halloran
contributing writer

The sight of quarterback Matt Miller scrambling right, left, ahead and back became quite familiar last Saturday at Nebraska. Whether it was the senior throwing the ball away, throwing on the run or scrambling for his welfare, it was a long afternoon for Miller.

Coach Bill Snyder said the sacks can be attributed to many things.

"Obviously, it's an issue, but it's a general issue because they're created in different ways, and not all nine of those were created the same way," Snyder said at yesterday's weekly press conference.

Before the OSU game Oct. 14, K-State quarterbacks had only been sacked 14 times, or an average of less than three times a game. But when the level of competition got better, so did the opponent's pass rush.

"There's a lot of things you have to address," Snyder said. "It isn't always the pass protection."

Snyder said many of the things other than pass rush that Nebraska did deserve credit.

"A sack can be created by something other than faulty pass protection or other than the mechanics of an individual blocking another individual," Snyder said. "There's a variety of different things, and all of them don't relate to whether an offensive tackle can block a defensive end.

"We had some breakdowns, but not how it might have appeared."

Snyder said Miller and he have discussed the breakdowns.

"I would have liked for him to get out of the pocket against Nebraska on several occasions, but he was just trapped, and there wasn't any way to get out — he couldn't throw and couldn't bring it down and get out," Snyder said. "I don't know what anybody would have done."

The juggling of the offensive line without starting center Jason Johnson made it more difficult to defend against Nebraska.

Kendyl Jacox was moved to center for the game, and Snyder said Johnson will return for Saturday's 12:10 p.m. game against Kansas at KSU Stadium, but was practicing behind Jacox Monday. Johnson, a six-foot-three, 273-pound junior, suffered an elbow injury against OSU.

"Jason is better than he was a week ago," Snyder said. "It's my anticipation that he'll be ready to play."

In the sixth-ranked Jayhawks (7-0), K-State faces another top-ranked opponent.

Kansas stifled Oklahoma in the second half last week, holding the Sooners to three second-half points in the 38-17 win.

The KU defense, under new coordinator Mike Hankwitz, who came to Lawrence after several seasons in the same capacity at Colorado, ranks sixth in the Big 8 in total defense, but second and 12th in the nation in turnover margin with a plus-eight.

"It's far different from what they've done in the past," Snyder said of the Kansas attack. "They have a different approach and a different philosophy, and anytime you have a change, there's enthusiasm and excitement."

Volleyball team to rematch Cyclones after earlier loss

Shana Newell
staff writer

The last time the Wildcats and the Cyclones faced off on the volleyball court, it was a showdown. Iowa State defeated the Cats in five games. The Cyclones rallied back from a two-game deficit to win, 15-5, 15-9, 5-15, 14-16, 12-15.

Since then, the Wildcats have dropped two more Big 8 matches against Oklahoma and Nebraska and have defeated Kansas and Missouri.

With five more Big 8 matches still to play, and two additional matches against district foe Oral Roberts University, Coach Jim Moore continues to take one day at a time.

"We're going to worry about playing well and not worry about the past or the future," Moore said.

Ranked fifth in the district, Moore said that the team is not feeling any undue pressure to win against Iowa State.

"This is not a make-or-break match," Moore said. "It is not a do-or-die match. We just need to be the best we can be."

Hitting the road again after a brief home stint resulting in a Missouri defeat, the Wildcats are 16-5 overall and 3-3 in the Big 8.

The Cats go to Ames to take on Iowa State in Hilton Coliseum tonight for a 7:30 match. The Cyclones have a 14-7 overall record and are 5-1 in the Big 8.

"Success breeds confidence," Moore said. "As long as we're playing well, that's what we're going to worry about."

Moore said he does not attach any importance to tonight's match.

"Of course I'd like to win and play well, but if we're going to lose the match, it doesn't mean anything," Moore said. "It doesn't mean anything if we win, either. We just need to play well."

Leading the K-State team will be senior hitter Jill Dugan, junior play-set-hitter Yolanda "Toie" Young, sophomore setter Devon Rynning and junior middle blocker Kate DeClerk.

Dugan is hitting .205, averaging three kills a game. She has 222 kills on the season and 23 service aces. Dugan also leads the team in digs and solo blocks with 248 and 12, respectively.

Young has 217 kills, hitting .277, and she has 25 service aces for the squad.

Phillips returns to practice, should play Nov. 4 game against Iowa State

Tailback who has not practiced since Sept. 10 returned to team yesterday

Associated Press

LINCOLN, Neb. — Six weeks after he was dismissed from the team for hitting a former girlfriend, Nebraska tailback Lawrence Phillips returned to practice Tuesday and is expected to play Nov. 4 against Iowa State.

Phillips, a junior from West Covina, Calif., had not practiced since Sept. 10, when he was arrested for hitting Kate McEwen at the apartment of transfer quarterback Scott Frost. Police said McEwen, a 20-year-old Nebraska basketball player, was dragged down a flight of stairs.

"He (Phillips) looked like a guy who hadn't practiced for six weeks," Coach Tom Osborne said after practice. "He told us he was out of shape, and he was."

Phillips did not speak to reporters, but the university released a statement from him.

"I'm sorry that this happened," Phillips said. "I know I can't undo the situation, but I'm trying to learn from it."

"I haven't run from the problem, but I am facing it head on. I have taken all the necessary steps toward returning to the team and will continue my counseling and will follow the sanctions determined by the university."

McEwen, in a statement read by her coach, Angela Beck, said: "Nothing can be done to change what has happened to me. I'm glad this situation is finally coming to an end, and I'm anxious to get on with my life and basketball."

Osborne, who initially dismissed Phillips from the team but later called it an indefinite suspension, said Phillips would not travel with No. 2

Nebraska for Saturday's game at No. 7 Colorado. But Osborne said Phillips would suit up against Iowa State next week.

Osborne said university officials tried to treat Phillips as they would any other student with the same offense.

"The easy thing would have been to dismiss him, probably permanently — probably the most popular thing would have been to do that," Osborne said. "But basically after examining all of the factors involved — many of which you will never be privy to and shouldn't be — we simply didn't feel it was the right thing to do."

"So we tried to do the right thing, the best thing for Lawrence Phillips, the victim and other people Lawrence Phillips will come into contact with throughout his lifetime."

Phillips awaits sentencing Dec. 1 after being convicted of misdemeanor assault and trespassing. Prosecutors have said they will recommend probation.

Phillips sees a Lincoln counselor and a psychiatrist each week. Based on their evaluations and those made by staff at the Menninger Clinic in Topeka, Osborne said, Phillips is not psychotic, he does not have abnormal brain waves or a personality disorder.

"They have deemed him not dangerous to himself or others any more than most people," he said.

Athletic director Bill Byrne said McEwen remained under 24-hour protection, which she had received at the university's expense since immediately after the attack.

But her coach said McEwen no longer was receiving the round-the-clock protection.

"She feels safe," Beck said.

Contact between Phillips and McEwen is barred, but Osborne said a court order barring Phillips from having contact with Frost was modified to allow the two to practice together.

"We're glad that he's coming back," tailback Clinton Childs said. "He's part of our Husker family — every player that's here needs football. It's been part of our lives since we were little kids."

Phillips has missed five games, and Osborne called it a gamble to bring him back.

The coach said if Phillips were not allowed to return, he might make himself available to the NFL.

"I really felt if I said, 'Lawrence, the next game you'll play will be next September,' the odds would have gone to 90 percent that he would be gone at that point," Osborne said. "I didn't feel that was what he needed to do."

Osborne said Phillips needs a structured environment.

"Football, particularly, was important because it seemed to be a major strength, a major organizing factor in his life," Osborne said.

University sanctions require Phillips to pay for damage to the apartment building and for McEwen's medical expenses not covered by insurance.

He also must attend twice-weekly counseling through the semester, perform two hours of community service on campus each week through the academic year and attend his classes.

Phillips this month was cleared by the NCAA on questions surrounding his meal a year ago with a sports agent's employee and for accepting a car, airline tickets and spending money from the owners of a California group home where he lived as a teen-ager.

Captain Kangaroo addresses abuse

Nikola Zytow
staff reporter

Television's Captain Kangaroo will address the societal attitudes toward child abuse during a speech at the 19th annual Governor's Conference for the Prevention of Child Abuse and Neglect in Topeka Wednesday.

Robert Keeshan's speech, "Growing Up Happy," kicks off the three-day conference at the Kansas Expocentre in Topeka. Keeshan will speak from 7:30 to 9 p.m. Wednesday. Keeshan is known to millions of fans as the star of the children's television program, "Captain Kangaroo."

He has been a long-time advocate of children's issues and has written a book titled "Growing Up Happy, Captain Kangaroo Tells Yesterday's Children How to Nurture Their Own."

His speech, which is free and open to the public, will focus on the importance of parent-child relationships and societal attitudes toward children.

James Boyer, professor of curriculum and American ethnic studies at K-State, will speak from 7:30 to 9 a.m. Friday at the Kansas Expocentre.

His speech, "Preserving the Dignity of Children in a Multicultural Society" will focus on fulfilling the needs of a constantly growing population of multicultural children.

"For 12 years, I've been engaged in the prevention of child abuse and remediation," Boyer said.

Boyer said it is important a diversity of races be recruited into the child-care profession. Black and Hispanic, as well as other minority children, need to see role models with their own heritage from an early age.

Children can also relate to someone of their own race better in certain situations, Boyer said.

Skills, such as how to understand children of different races and backgrounds, are often missing from the educational curriculum of the child-care professional, Boyer said.

If a teacher does not understand crucial things about people of other races and backgrounds, they might not knowingly violate the dignity of a child. The dignity of a child needs to be as much preserved as the physical well-being.

Boyer described not preserving the dignity of a child, yelling at a child or traumatizing them in any way as instructional violence.

Boyer said throughout his many years of involvement in children's

"There's been a tremendous heightening of awareness in the last decade," Boyer said.

Attorney General Carla Stovall will address "The Urgency of Child Abuse and Neglect Prevention" from 10:50 a.m. to noon Friday at the Expocentre.

Stovall is active in Big Brothers/Big Sisters, Kansas Child Abuse Prevention Council and Kansas Children's Service League, among others.

Toxic fumes linger after railroad tank car leak

Associated Press

BOGALUSA, La. — Shifting wind today pushed a plume of poisonous gas leaking from a railroad tank car, closing an evacuation center and keeping some 1,500 people out of their homes.

"We're dodging this cloud," Washington Parish Sheriff's Deputy Terry Smith said as emergency crews moved their command post from a city baseball field to a furniture store.

The wind shift also forced officials to shut down one evacuation center and to move the most severely ill patients from nearby Bogalusa Community Medical Center, police Capt. Denver Penton said. He did not know how many people were involved.

However, rain that accompanied the wind helped to dissipate the nitrogen tetroxide gas, he said. Crews worked to neutralize the chemical.

People up to two miles south and southeast of the Gaylord Chemical Corp. plant in the heart of Bogalusa were warned to stay inside with doors and windows shut, and to listen to emergency broadcasts, state police Sgt. Wayne Winkler said.

Hundreds of people went to hospitals Monday complaining of sore throats, burning eyes and shortness of breath.

Roads into Bogalusa, about 60 miles north of New Orleans, were closed. So were the city's nine public schools and a Catholic school.

National Transportation Safety Board investigators were headed to Bogalusa, spokesman Pat Cariseo said.

The railroad car began leaking around 4 p.m. Monday and ruptured with a bang about 45 minutes later, Washington Parish Sheriff's Deputy Chris Nicolais said.

Louis Zeelman, president of Gaylord, said today that pressure had built up inside the car.

The rupture released a pinkish-yellow cloud that hovered over the area. Crews sprayed water to dilute the chemical.

That cloud had dissipated by early today, but the fumes lingered.

"The gas is really, really bad stuff. It's fatal if inhaled," state Trooper Russell Mayfield said. Doctors went on New Orleans TV stations to advise anyone exposed to seek medical attention.

"It looks like a temporary thing for all of them," said state Rep. Jerry Thomas, a doctor at Riverside Medical Center in Franklinton, 20 miles from Bogalusa, said of those seeking treatment. "Some are receiving oxygen; some are just taking breaths and it's going away."

The 1,500 evacuees came from a mandatory evacuation zone immediately around the plant. Outside that zone, more than half the town's 16,000 residents live in a voluntary evacuation area; many stayed home with their windows tightly closed.

The cloud that formed Monday was around 200 yards long, said Benton Lively, who lives near the plant.

"It was a big pink cloud, bright pink, like somebody took a crayon and used it over the mill. The pink later gave way to orange as the cloud grew darker, then began to diminish," Lively said.

Nitrogen tetroxide is used in rocket fuel but it was used at Gaylord's paper mill — adjacent to the chemical plant — to make heavy brown paper for boxes and bags.

It was unclear how many people sought medical attention.

Police Capt. Ernie Wells said about 300 people were treated at Bogalusa Community Medical Center, including two admitted to intensive care, and another 100 at Washington-St. Tammany Regional Medical Center, nearly a mile from the mill.

It also was unclear when evacuees would be able to go home.

One 88-year-old woman did not evacuate willingly.

"The law brought me — they arrested me because I didn't want to leave," a flustered Erma Haik said early today at a Baptist church just outside the evacuation zone.

importance of the U.N.," she said. "We offer support and constructive criticism for a better U.N."

Patrick Chan, student from Hong Kong, said the world needs the United Nations.

"We need the United Nations to unite all nations, all races, all cultures," he said.

The United Nations is important because it promotes peace and understanding of cultures, Laura Villalba, student from Paraguay, said.

"I think it's really important to know about other cultures and compare them to your own," she said.

One man at the ceremony was once employed by the United Nations.

"I was once a staff meteorologist for the U.N. in Geneva, Switzerland," John Davies, retired meteorologist, said.

Davies said he was responsible for making plans for disaster prevention and relief coordination.

"I once spent a week coordinating international relief efforts in St. Lucia after it was wiped out by hurricanes," he said.

The local U.N. chapter has about 100 members and does many things to promote understanding of the United Nations.

"We've had seminars and classes to help people to become better informed of the United Nations," Schwab said.

Five area elementary schools also had U.N. flag-raising ceremonies.

Peace was the theme for many of the schools celebrating the 50th anniversary of the United Nations.

"We're going to share peace together through a handshake," Penny Sturr, principal of Woodrow Wilson School, said.

The children shook hands and said "peace" to each other. Some children shook hands slowly, some violently and some wouldn't stop shaking hands.

Glenn Busset, former president of the Flint Hills chapter of the United Nations, said it is the local chapter's objective to provide flags to every school that asks for them.

Woodrow Wilson School was the first school to raise a flag Tuesday. The school had its ceremony at 8:15 Tuesday morning.

The children watched as their fellow student, Nicaragua-born Isaacs Gutierrez, helped Busset raise the U.N. flag.

"We wanted a foreign-born international student to help with the U.N. flag-raising," said Bonnie Kastanek, multi-age primary teacher for first and second grades. "We felt that a foreign-born student would represent diversity."

Gutierrez, a fifth-grade student who is an aspiring baseball player, said the United Nations is important.

"The U.N. is good because it brings peace to the world," he said.

Kastanek said the U.N. flag raising is part of the school's geography theme.

"Our focus is to promote awareness of the diversity of people throughout the world," she said. "We also want to have the children concentrate on peace throughout the world."

Roosevelt school has been flying the U.N. flag for seven years. This is its third flag-raising ceremony.

"We've had the flag-raising ceremony the longest of all the other schools," Katha Hurt, first-grade teacher, said.

"We sent letters to all the other schools to start it, and Ogden started the next year."

The students at Roosevelt school are aware of the purpose of the United Nations.

"The U.N. is working for peace, you know, no more war," said Edward Lee Jones, sixth-grade student at Roosevelt School.

Atina Hanna, representative from the local U.N. chapter, said if people want to have peace in the world, they need to look right here in Manhattan.

"The mission of peace and understanding can start right here," she said.

UNITED NATIONS

U.N. leaders resolve to restore budget

Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — World leaders wrapped up their largest gathering in history Tuesday, promising — with few specifics — to revive the United Nations and restore its financial health. Many leaders praised the United Nations on its 50th birthday. But one president, who has seen firsthand the vast gulf between U.N. resolutions and resolve, sounded a warning.

"Let us listen to what they are saying, but let us ask them what they are doing," Bosnian President Alija Izetbegovic said of his counterparts. "As soon as they return home, unfortunately, they will continue their course. It is up to us to stop them."

During three days of speechmaking, national leaders took the opportunity to expound on virtually every issue facing humanity including poverty and hunger, the environment, population, terrorism, crime, the Bosnian war, Middle East peace and nuclear arms.

In a joint declaration to be approved later Tuesday at the close of the 50th anniversary ceremonies, they focused on the United Nations itself. More than 180 kings, princes, presidents and premiers pledged to revitalize the organization and create new opportunities for peace, development, democracy and cooperation.

The statement also called on the United States and other countries to pay their bills. The United States, the biggest debtor in the 185-member organization, accounts for $1.3 billion of the $3 billion owed.

President Clinton, who addressed the opening session Sunday, promised to work with the Republican-controlled Congress to pay the U.S. debt. But he insisted the United Nations slash spending, reduce its bureaucracy and streamline overlapping agencies.

The three-day gathering was as colorful, as diverse and at times as unruly as humanity itself. Traffic in one of the world's most densely populated areas ground to a halt as police convoys sped world leaders to and from meetings around New York.

Protesters hounded controversial figures such as Cuban President Fidel Castro and Chinese President Jiang Zemin. On Tuesday, 800 Taiwanese marched through Manhattan, New York, streets denouncing the Beijing government's rights record.

The birthday celebration was overshadowed by the United Nations' financial crisis and demands from all quarters for reform. The seven-page declaration, hammered out during months of consultations, endorsed numerous reform goals but offered few details on how to achieve them.

For example, it calls for expanding the powerful 15-seat Security Council, dominated by the five permanent members: the United States, Britain, France, Russia and China. Permanent members can veto resolutions.

FIRE

Dryer causes fire at Derby

Sara Edwards

staff writer

Students in the Derby Complex were awakened to the sound of sirens Tuesday morning. At about 1:20 a.m., the Manhattan Fire Department responded to a fire in the Derby Dining Center.

The fire started in a dryer in the Derby Dining Center laundry room. The laundry room is near the dock area of Derby.

The laundry room is only used by Dining Services, said Shah Hasan, assistant director of Housing and Dining Services.

The fire was apparently caused by rags and aprons left in one of the dryers in the laundry room, said Mary Molt, assistant director of Housing and Dining Services.

Damage to the Derby Dining Center was minimal. The fire ruined the dryer, and there was smoke in the area. There was no fire damage, Molt said.

"The biggest loss was the dryer," Molt said.

Jerry Snyder, battalion chief of the Manhattan Fire Department, said the damage estimate for the dryer was $5,000. The smoke damage to the walls and ceilings was about $250, and smoke and heat damage to the contents of the dryer was about $300.

Molt said dining services at Derby were not affected. The fire was isolated to just the laundry room.

"I don't think it caused disruption to our services, and I don't expect it to," Hasan said.

Students noticed the smell of smoke at breakfast Tuesday morning.

Debi Griffiths, freshman in pre-veterinary medicine, said she was unaware there had been a fire, but the Derby Dining Center smelled like smoke when she went to get breakfast.

"It smelled like something was burning, but I didn't think much about it being as it was in Derby," Griffiths said.

Acoustic art to encompass coffee shop

contributing writer

Have a cappuccino and kick back tonight at the Espresso Royale Caffe for the live acoustic blues, contemporary and bluegrass-roots blend of Cathy Winter.

In addition to her collection of original work, she is also known for renditions of vintage croonings of the great Billie Holiday, "Mississippi" John Hurt, Lizzie Miles and Jack Teagarden.

After touring mostly blues bars and coffee houses throughout the East Coast in the '70s, her social conscience led her to a path pursuing women's rights and other progressive issues.

As a result, Winter joined Betsy Rose, another accomplished folk and bluegrass acoustic songstress with a conscience.

The duo worked together from 1976 until 1982, when Winter branched out on her own again.

Winter has three solo albums behind her, all recorded on Chicago's Flying Fish Records, and all available in Manhattan record stores.

Her first release, "Breath On My Fire," was followed shortly after by "Traveling Home" in 1988, and later by "Next Sweet Time" in 1992.

Winter has been involved various live nationwide competitions, including her alternate role in the 1994 Northeast Regional Folk Alliance Conference, where she was one of 21 performers chosen to compete in an audition.

She was also one of six songwriters selected in April of this year for the New Jersey Folk Festival's songwriter showcase, the first of its kind, and she won first place in the Intinet Songwriting Contest for 1995.

Winter has worked with legendary blues artists Etta Baker, John Jackson and Ellen MacIlwaine at a variety of blues workshops and festivals.

Last spring, she performed in England for her first British tour of her career.

Critics from coast to coast, including the Boston Globe, the Washington Post and the Tacoma Victory Review rave about the integrity and strength in her politics, poetry, storytelling and tradition as a lyricist as well as her talent as a musician and vocalist.

The presentation will begin at 8:30 tonight at the Espresso Royale Caffe with no cover charge.

Listening and waiting

Josh Longbottom, Manhattan High School student, listens to Janet Reno answer his question during the 103rd Landon Lecture Tuesday evening at Bramlage Coliseum.

how to do arithmetic, we can teach them to resolve conflict without knives and guns and fists," she said.

Reno's own experience with child-rearing began when a friend died and left Reno as the legal guardian of her twin boy and girl.

"Being Attorney General has been a great honor, but nothing can compare to what you can do if you reach out to children," Reno said.

Domestic violence is another family issue that needs to be addressed. Children learn violence as a way of life from watching their fathers beat their mothers, Reno said.

In addition, Reno said busy working parents tend to have less time for their children.

America can overcome the problems of youth violence and isolation if the nation bonds together as a community.

"I have no doubt that we can meet this challenge," she said.

Matt Love, senior in apparel and textile marketing, said Reno made some good points.

"I think there was a lot to be learned from what she said," Love said.

PHELPS

member Pat Broxterman, sophomore in speech, said Phelps was trying to grab people's attention by going to extremes.

"I think what people, such as Fred Phelps, try to do is make a statement by being ultra negative and make people mad at them," he said.

Phelps is just trying to make a spectacle of himself and get attention, Ralph Utermohlen, retired faculty of K-State, said.

"I feel it doesn't do him or society any good," he said.

Kim Truesdell, sophomore in human development and family studies, said people attending Reno's lecture would ignore Phelps and realize Reno's importance politically.

During last week's "A Purple Affair," Phelps called Reno a 24-carat lesbian, and that is why he said he protested her at the Landon Lecture.

"I just hate them here," Mindy McMillan, sophomore in horticulture, said.

ture, said.

McMillan said she just wanted Phelps and his fellow protesters to leave.

Katie Kimble, junior in life sciences, said she thinks Phelps is a hypocrite.

"God hates the sin, not the sinner," Kimble said.

Protester James Hockenberger, 18, said he cannot do anything to convince people the signs are true.

"I just hold them, and it's God almighty's job to work on their hearts," he said.

MALL

1992 commission agreed to pay the rent for five years.

The 1997 starting date for the mall owners to start paying rent was a compromise between 1996, the previous request of the commission, and 1998, the year Forest City wanted to start paying rent.

Commissioner Steve Hall opposed the motion and said he wanted rent to start being paid in 1996. Later Hall made a motion that Forest City pay back rent for the last four years. The motion failed.

Hall, who is also the owner of Office World, said by paying the mall's rent, the commission was giving an unfair advantage to the mall. He called for the playing field to be leveled between smaller retailers, such as himself, and bigger business, such as the mall.

"Nobody abates our rent, and nobody gives us any special circumstances," Hall said.

At Tuesday night's meeting, James Richardson, Forest City project developer, said rent repayment would move up from a No. 4 spot to a No. 2 spot on Forest City's list of financial priorities. The No. 1 priority is debt service.

Richardson urged the commission not to lose sight of the issue.

"Let's not lose focus of what the real issue is, and that's the remarketing of the bonds," Richardson said.

Lennar Northeast Partnership holds $19 million in mall bonds. By refinancing the bonds, Forest City is looking for a lower interest rate on the bonds. Prospective buyers include FirstBank, BC Christopher Co., and Crews and Associates.

Forest City is looking to take advantage of the current low interest rate and good economy to remarket the bonds as soon as possible.

If the commission decides not to let the bonds be remarketed, Forest City could be in trouble. In 1977, Lennar could exercise the put option.

This option would allow Lennar to force Forest City to pay the bonds off immediately.

Forest City would have the option of paying the bonds back or finding another buyer for the bonds.

If Forest City decided not to pay the bonds back, Lennar could foreclose on the mall. With no management system, the mall would be owned by the bond owner, which could potentially close the mall down.

Because of the complicated nature of the transactions and the stakes involved, the commission decided not to make any hasty decisions.

Rather, it chose to amend the conditions and have Forest City review them again. It will then be up to Forest City to decide if it wants to accept or reject the conditions.

In other business, the commission met with the boards of county commissioners of Pottawatomie and Riley counties to present them with a petition requesting Riley County be designated the disaster agency for Manhattan.

ARRESTS

Wired regarding the incident.

"Nyle called me to assure me that the damage to the house would be taken care of. It was probably about the first of October," Smith said.

"He didn't admit that he was involved, but he knew the damage was done and he wanted to assure me that the damage was going to be taken care of. He said he had a friend that was in the contracting business, and would it be OK if he came over and gave us an estimate," he said.

Though Smith said he agreed to let Wren's friend provide an estimate, he had no knowledge of an estimate being given, and the damage has not been repaired.

"I don't know if the friend ever came over, and the damage has not yet been taken care of," Smith said.

Though one of the victims and all of the individuals arrested are students, Student Governing Association Attorney General Becca Korphage said the incident lies outside the jurisdiction of the student judicial system.

"There is no cross-jurisdiction involved," Korphage said. "If it is an off-campus event, even if everyone involved is a student, we have no jurisdiction."

Pat Bosco, dean of Student Life, said there are very few instances when the campus judicial system would be expanded to events occurring off campus.

"Typically, our student judiciary addresses issues of University rules and regulations on campus. Only in extreme circumstances under the student government constitution would we extend our student judiciary constitution beyond campus," Bosco said.

"Our student judiciary does not get involved in criminal matters that occur off campus like this incident."

"That's not to say that in this instance we will not get involved."

Bosco said the status of those arrested as football players would have no bearing on any decisions the University would make.

"The football program may want to address this, but the incident did not occur at a sponsored University event. From a dean's perspective, three football players involved in an alleged assault are not different from any other students who are involved in an alleged assault incident," Bosco said.

"Just because they happen to be part of the football team is no reason for a distinction. The media is what makes the distinction between individual students," he said.

Shana Newell contributed to this story.

Senate chair to sponsor impeachment bill

Cristina Janney

city-government writer

The Student Senate chair Wednesday said he intended to sponsor a bill of impeachment against a student senator.

Chair John Potter said he would sponsor a bill of impeachment against Michael Henry, arts and sciences senator, for unexcused absences from Senate meetings.

Henry has two unexcused absences from Senate meetings and an unexcused absence from the Senate retreat.

The Student Governing Association Constitution and By-laws say three unexcused absences are grounds for impeachment.

The Senate chair is responsible for determining what absences are excused, and Potter determined Henry's absences were unexcused.

Potter's decision came after the Senate Operations Committee voted against a motion to sponsor a bill of impeachment against Henry Monday night.

Senate Operations Committee is supposed to sponsor a bill of impeachment if it finds there are grounds for impeachment.

The members of the committee who voted against the motion said they did not believe there were grounds for impeachment because they thought the absence from retreat should have been excused because Henry had to work.

Potter said the job of the committee was not to try Henry's case. That was Student Tribunal's job, he said.

Impeachment is a three-step process that is set up so Senate does not sit in judgment of its members, Potter said.

If the committee decided to sponsor the legislation, the issue would have gone before Senate. If two-thirds of Senate voted to impeach, the sena-

Opinions mixed in players' arrests

Kimberly Hefling

Student opinion was mixed Wednesday afternoon as to what the outcome should be for the three K-State football players arrested Tuesday evening.

Starters defensive end Nyle Wren, linebacker Percell Gaskins and backup quarterback Brian Kavanagh were each charged with two counts of battery and one count of criminal damage to property, criminal trespass, conspiracy to commit battery and cruelty to animals, related to an incident that happened Aug. 20 on the 1600 block of Leavenworth Street.

All charges are misdemeanors, and a court date has been set for 1 p.m. Nov. 1.

Michael Reilly, junior in accounting, said he does not believe the players should be reprimanded by Coach Bill Snyder.

"It wasn't University-related, so it's not a big deal," Reilly said. "It's a misdemeanor. It's the same charge in court as getting a speeding ticket."

Kiffnie Holt, junior in horticulture, said she disagreed.

SNYDER SAYS CHARGES NOT FULLY ACCURATE

K-State football coach Bill Snyder defended arrested players Nyle Wren, Percell Gaskins and Brian Kavanagh.

"The misdemeanor charges as they pertain to these three young men are not entirely accurate," Snyder said in a statement released Wednesday.

* "The disciplinary measures were handled at the time of the incident are still being administered where they're appropriate."

Snyder's statement did not address whether the three would play Saturday against Kansas, and Sports Information Director Ben Boyle had no further comment.

Thomas E. Atcitty, vice president of the Navajo Nation, speaks on the need for the Navajo Nation to become more self-sufficient to help in offsetting the U.S.'s national debt during his speech Wednesday afternoon in Leasure Hall. Atcitty suggested that if his tribe were to be given the mineral rights to their land, jobs could be created in the mining and supplying of power to Navajo homes.

Cutbacks make crisis

Navajo Nation resents government intrusion

Camille Wood

staff reporter

Problems between the Navajo Nation Indian Tribe and the federal government are a crisis, the vice president of the Navajo Nation said Wednesday.

Vice President Thomas E. Atcitty said the nation resents federal cutbacks because it feels the people have always received cuts and this is a violation of their 1868 treaty with the U.S. government.

"We feel we have a sacred agreement called a treaty," Atcitty said. "Provisions of the treaty are clear, undeniable and binding."

The Navajo Nation territory spans Arizona, Utah and Mexico. The reservation population stands at 169,000, according to a 1995 survey.

Native Americans have been consistently underfunded, and their provisions were either not totally met or violated all along, Atcitty said.

"First, we had a crisis to maintain world peace — now we're facing another crisis — meeting the national debt," Atcitty said.

Atcitty said he understood federal cutbacks have been made because of the surmountable size of the national debt. He said because all Native Americans have always been under-funded, they should not be associated with its growth.

"We feel Native Americans have not been the cause of the size of the national debt," Atcitty said.

The nation has been working toward local empowerment and a capacity-building campaign. These goals will give their community strength, he said.

Atcitty said that of the 110 chapters within the Navajo Nation, 100 are government-run. He said with local empowerment, the people will control themselves.

"We want to give them the power to run taxes, generate revenue and write and pass laws themselves," Atcitty said.

With a capacity-building campaign, the nation would train other tribesmen to run their local governments, Atcitty said.

Gaming in casinos is another issue of concern for Indian nations. He said because of the money generated by them, many Native American communities are able to build schools on their reservations, or like Connecticut, donate $1 million to the state.

But Navajos have voted against gaming and having casinos on reservations. He said November's election voted 104-6 against it. The nation is still exploring and investigating the effects of gaming, he said.

"We can't target our Navajo people to depend on their meager incomes," Atcitty said. "They're the poorest of the poor."

But Atcitty said they no longer want to take handouts, even though they were inadequate. Instead, the people want to work to build their nation and attract business developments, he said.

Atcitty said somewhere there is money to be made by the Navajo Nation through mining, power-plant and gas-plant jobs. He said they want to work with their natural resources.

"It's our responsibility to protect the creation — nature," Atcitty said.

"When we create an imbalance, we pay for it — we suffer."

One development in progress is a lawsuit against the government for the Navajos to receive the mineral rights to the coal on their reservation. He said the federal government refuses to relinquish these rights.

The Navajos are willing to share these ideas with other Indian tribes, he said.

"We hope to be replicated among other tribes. We've been sharing our experiences with others," Atcitty said.

Clyde Henderson, adviser of Native American Student Body, said sharing is the main reason for bringing Atcitty here from his reservation to speak.

"It's a great opportunity for him to interact with them because some never grew up on a reservation like me," Henderson said. "It was a chance for them to make a connection and maybe make a future link."

Atcitty was sponsored by the American Ethnic Studies Program, College of Education, College of Human Ecology, Native American Student Body and the Office of Multicultural Affairs.

ALLOCATIONS

Organizations lack facts in budget request forms

Lisa Elliott

staff writer

Student organizations did not have all the facts when they turned their budget request forms in to Student Senate for spring allocations.

As a result, the largest student group on campus did not receive funding.

Several student organizations did not submit budget requests that met funding guidelines this fall, John Potter, Senate chairman, said.

"The calendar is normally set before funding guidelines are passed," Potter said. "That's why groups don't know what's going on."

One group was the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls, which has more than 3,000 members.

On its request form, the group asked for funding for the Wildcat Walk Escort Service, a national conference and Spring Fling, Eric Keen, KSUARH president, said.

Keen said he submitted those three projects because they are the biggest expenditures made by the organization. Allocations Committee cut two projects from the KSUARH funding bill because of their nature.

The escort service will be a special allocation sometime this semester, but it could not count as one of the projects because the request for funding was too high, Keen said.

"We wasted one project because we didn't know the conference had to be a special allocation," he said. "They neglected to tell us all the rules."

The Allocations Committee recommended a $300 allocation for Spring Fling, but Potter ruled the event would be social at the Senate meeting Oct. 17. Funding a social event is also against funding guidelines.

In the end, KSUARH received no money from the Student Activity fee for next semester.

Keen said he met with Lach Franquemont, Allocations Committee member, before the allocations bill was presented to Senate.

"He never said Spring Fling was a social event," Keen said.

OBITUARY

Professor, scientist remembered for his advice

Zayas

Lisa Elliott

staff writer

One of K-State's food and nutrition professors died Tuesday morning of a heart attack.

Joseph Zayas, a meat scientist, was born in Poland on April 7, 1932. He was a member of the K-State faculty for 12 years. Zayas was 63.

"He was a wonderful person and a good friend," Jane Bowers, head of the Department of Food and Nutrition, said. "It's a very big loss for our department."

Zayas advised graduate students and taught many classes in the food and nutrition department. He was teaching the food research techniques class this semester.

Zayas earned three food science degrees, including a master's in 1956, a Ph.D. in 1962 and a doctor of science in 1970 from the Moscow Meat and Dairy Technology Institute.

He had 18 patents and published more than 130 papers, three books, a textbook and three translated monographs, and made many presentations to scholarly magazines in the food sciences throughout Europe and the United States.

"He was a meat scientist," Bowers said. "He worked in Russia and was known all over Europe."

Zayas was known for providing both academic and personal advice to his students.

Zayas suffered a massive heart attack Monday afternoon and died early Tuesday morning, she said.

He was visiting his son in Providence, R.I. at the time.

Zayas is survived by his wife, Inna, of the home; a son, Vladislav, a daughter-in-law and two granddaughters in Providence; and other relative in Poland.

Funeral services will be Thursday morning in Providence.

The food and nutrition department is planning a memorial service. No date has been set.

► K-STATE GRADS SHARE EBOLA OUTBREAK EXPERIENCES IN LECTURE

The 1989 ebola outbreak in Reston, Va., is the focus of a current bestseller, "The Hot Zone."

Jerry and Nancy Jaax, central characters in the book, will speak today at 7 p.m. in Union Forum Hall.

During the ebola outbreak in the Reston, monkey facility, Col. Jerry Jaax led a team of soldiers and scientists who worked to contain the outbreak. Col. Nancy Jaax played a key role in diagnosing, studying and managing the outbreak.

Jerry, a 1972 K-State graduate, and Nancy, a 1973 K-State graduate, serve as consultants to the surgeon general for their veterinary specialties in the Department of Defense.

Their presentation, "Return of the Hot Zone: A Case Study in the Management of an Emerging Virus Outbreak," is the first Don Kelley Lecture.

► TRAIN HITS SCHOOL BUS; 5 DEAD

FOX RIVER GROVE, Ill. (AP) — A commuter train ripped apart a school bus stopped on the tracks Wednesday as youngsters in the back rushed forward in terror at the sight of 620 tons of steel bearing down on them. Five students were killed and about 30 injured.

Some witnesses said the bus was trying to cross the tracks about 7:20 a.m. when it was caught at a red light behind a car and couldn't make it all the way across. But others said there was no car ahead and the driver could have moved forward.

"You could see the terror in their eyes," witness Coreen Bachinsky said. "You could hear the metal, the glass flying, the screams. It was very, very scary."

The bus was taking the youngsters to 1,400-student Cary-Grove High School in Cary. The Chicago-bound express train was traveling between 50 and 60 mph and sheared the body of the bus off the chassis, spinning it around 180 degrees.

"From then on out, all you heard was screaming," said Andrea Arens, 19, who was waiting for another train in this bedroom community nearly 40 miles northwest of Chicago, in a fast-growing commuter corridor at the edge of the city's suburban sprawl.

Four students were pronounced dead at the scene, and one died at a hospital. At least seven of the injured were in critical condition.

Taben Johanson, a 15-year-old who was sitting in his usual third-row seat on the bus, said the gate came down on the back of the bus and there was a car in front. Then he looked up and saw the train bearing down on them.

"I basically figured it out when all the kids were running forward, screaming," he said.

Jim Homola, a carpenter driving his children to school, said he had been stopped behind the bus and saw the approaching train. "We started screaming, 'Go! Go!'" he said. "It was over in a matter of seconds."

Homola said the bus driver was in hysterics afterward.

Crews strive to make deadline

THE MUSIC MAN

Pre-production

Jeni Pruitt
staff reporter

The talk at the round table is so intense it would make Clinton's negotiations in Bosnia look like a birthday party.

The production crew for "The Music Man" is not asking for world peace — they just want the production to run smoothly by Nov. 16, which is opening night.

While the costume crew and the set constructors are busy sewing and building, the designers and directors are busy battling it out in weekly meetings and trying to coordinate the activities to make sure the production flows together as one piece.

"The meetings can get very intense," Jennifer Huston, junior in theater and stage manager, said. "There's been people who have walked out of these meetings. There's been people who scream and threaten to get someone fired. It's usually over something small, and then in five minutes or so, it gets resolved."

The designer of each facet of the production attends each of the meetings.

John Uthoff, lighting designer, rubs his eyes as he waits for the meeting to begin. Huston nervously twirls her pen as Luke Kahlich, director, drops his black notebook crammed shut with yellow and white papers on the table. David Centers, set designer, rushes in late and opts for a chair outside the circle. Dana Pinkston, costume designer, asks with a sarcastic sigh, "Advil, anyone?"

The hour-long meeting begins.

The production meeting is the time the designers coordinate when to move in the set, call in the technical crew, put costumes on the actors and put together the props.

"This is the exciting part that people don't see," Kahlich said with a facetious laugh. "We do lots of non-creative things like asking questions like, 'Can we afford that?'"

The meeting heats up when the designers fill their calendars with appointments and rehearsal times, and work out the technical aspects of the show.

"People don't realize how much happens before the show opens," Huston said. "Like there's a two-second bit where someone throws a firecracker. It will probably take us two hours to get this down so that it doesn't hit or hurt someone."

Sometimes the meetings become intense when the technical aspects can't be worked out.

"Oh God, we're going to have to figure this out," Pinkston said, running her hands through her hair.

Huston reaffirmed everyone with a sigh. "It will all work."

Huston is not just saying that because she's an eternal optimist — she has to say it. If errors are made or conflicts can't be resolved, she is responsible.

"If I screw up, about 20,000 people come running towards me with horrible looks on their faces," Huston said.

Huston's job is to coordinate and mediate everything that goes on in the production. After sitting down that each designer before the production begins, she knows every designer's schedule by memory.

Huston carries around a 6-inch black prompt book which contains, as she put it, "everything you want to know about 'The Music Man.'"

The book, which should be more fittingly called the production Bible, has the personnel schedule, the script, notes from all the meetings about the show, a calendar for the show and even medical forms about each of the performers in the production.

The medical forms are a safety measure just in case something happens to one of the performers.

"In 'Twelfth Night,' Scott Chamoff tripped on his rollerblades as he was coming off stage and fell and hit his nose," Huston said. "Blood was squirting all over the place. Had he been unconscious, we would have had to call 911 and would've needed the medical information on the sheet."

Huston also talks with each of the designers before the production meeting to work out details so that the meeting will not last longer than an hour.

"I usually poke my head into their offices and ask if they have questions that we can take care of before the meeting," she said. "For example, today, I knew Dana had a few concerns that she didn't want to voice outright so I asked them for her. We try not to make the meetings too long because people get jumpy."

A week before the production, Huston will take over running the show.

"Come tech week, I'll basically take over the show," she said. "That's when Luke sits back and watches the show, and my job becomes figuring out how, what, when or why."

But don't think for a minute her job is all glamour. Huston usually gets handed the jobs in the production that nobody else wants.

"I get to be the punching bag," she said. "I usually get to be the one that gets to deliver the messages that no one wants to give the other designers. Sometimes I get an apology and sometimes I get an 'It's OK now.'"

"You have to be able to take it with a grain of salt and realize that it's not your fault if you get yelled at — unless, of course, it was your fault."

Successful allocations require communication

The committee or Senate should not have to spend unnecessary time on allocation bills that have problems or that go outside the allocations guidelines.

Every once in a while, one little thing can bog down an entire process. Case in point — the Student Senate allocation process. Another case in point — the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls and its recent problems trying to get funding.

Middle ground must be found in the allocation process. Miscommunication or no communication, although not commonplace in the process, can severely impede the Allocations Committee and Student Senate. They can also keep a student group from having a chance at receiving funds for a project.

The committee or Senate should not have to spend unnecessary time on allocation bills that have problems or that go outside of the allocations guidelines.

The Allocations Committee could possibly set aside a meeting time to sit down with leaders of student groups requesting funds and their liaisons to simply confirm the request. It wouldn't take much time to decide whether the application falls within the allocations guidelines. Any questions the student group might have could be asked and answered at this time.

Time could be saved in future meetings of the Allocations Committee and Senate if any problems with an allocations bill are ironed out in advance.

It is the responsibility of student groups to be informed of the ins and outs of the formal and informal guidelines of the allocations process. In other words, to reap the benefits of the system, you must know the system.

But at the same time, the Allocations Committee could review the applications for allocated money in advance before the application travels any further into the system.

Trimming budget involves compromise

As Congress begins to take final votes on the federal budget for the next fiscal year, I have noticed something different about America and its citizens.

On virtually every issue, from school lunch programs to llama wool subsidies, some special-interest group went to Washington to march in the streets, yell and denounce every effort by the Republicans to trim the budget on the grounds that it's going to take everyone's money away and give it to the nasty, greedy, rich people.

There is virtually no stop to this procession of people who misguidedly and incorrectly think they are saving all of humanity by ensuring their pet program doesn't get cut, in spite of the fact that there have been very few real cuts actually made.

Let me explain. For years, 40 to be exact, the Democrats controlled the House of Representatives, and every year they would make a budget and project how much spending would increase for the next year.

Thus, for the most part, when Republicans are accused of making draconian cuts, they are usually not cutting at all — they are simply reducing the amount of projected increase. This holds true for Medicare, Medicaid and even the school lunch program, among other programs.

Secondly, in the crusade to stop

Republicans from destroying all that is good and righteous in this country — in most of their minds, that is the government — many people are exhibiting behavior that is indicative of what happens when a government descends into an entitlement mentality.

From the streets of Washington to the electrical pulses of the Internet, people cry out that the evil, nasty, troll-like Republicans are taking away their programs, failing to remember that government money is taxpayer money, and a good deal of taxpayers are tired of financing everyone's pet programs.

These groups apparently believe if they make enough noise, they are rightfully entitled to their programs despite the fact that this means the costs will get passed on to the taxpayers in the form of higher taxes.

This has nothing to do with how much good these programs do; it has to do with the concept that no one should feel intimidated or be downgraded simply because they want to keep more of what they earn rather than give it to the federal government.

However, the federal government has created a new class of people in this society, the entitlement class. This is the group of people who first turn to government to solve their problems, consciously or not.

It is the attitude that if something needs to be fixed, government should be empowered to fix it.

However, this often causes more harm than good by failing to fix the problem and creating another group that learned to be dependent on the government.

The Great Society of the 1960s is a good example. Dedicated to eradicating poverty from this country, the programs enacted as a part of this effort have transferred more than one trillion — yes, trillion — dollars from one group to another, with the result that a large number of people live on welfare, rather than support themselves, because welfare is a better deal.

Welfare provides health benefits and other programs entry-level jobs cannot match.

COLUMN

JEREMY STEPHENS

Canine duo grabs limelight

I receive millions of letters each week asking that I write more columns about my dogs. OK, so I have only received ONE letter asking that I write more columns about my dogs.

Nonetheless, by stating I have received millions of letters, I am simply following the first rule in the Columnist's Code of Ethics (which also happens to be the same as the Congressperson's Code of Ethics), which is — always lie. This rule is based upon the fact that people believe everything they read, so why not take advantage of it?

READER ALERT: For all you superstitious people out there, please note the words columnist and congressperson ominously begin with the letter C.

The second rule in the Columnist's Code of Ethics is, "Never turn down an enormous, unwarranted pay raise, especially when the voters have no say in the matter." This rule, of course, has nothing to do with columnists and is solely there for the protection of enormous, unwarranted congresspersons, which at last count was roughly 535.

OK. OK. So I haven't received any letters asking I write more columns about my dogs. But that still doesn't mean there aren't millions of frustrated people out there who desire to hear the best in dog humor, but simply have not been able to convince their dogs to write a letter for them. ("Please, please, please Rover, write this letter for me, and I will let you watch all the Lassie reruns you want.")

As a result of no public demand whatsoever, my column this week is about our two dogs, Sidney (large, female, eating/pooping machine) and Keeshan (small, male, barking hairball).

READER ALERT: YENDIS is actually Sidney spelled backwards. Just thought you might want to know that in case you see an ambulance coming at you with yendis on the front of it.

Both dogs have gone through years of rigorous, extensive training in the highly technical art of sleeping. They do this most of the day, and they are so worn out by evening they also do it most of the night. But don't be fooled if you see either one of them in Sleep Mode. They have been cunningly trained to look like they are sleeping when, in fact, they are dead.

Keeshan is about 13 years old, while Sidney is going on 3. In dog years, of course, that makes Keeshan roughly the same age as George Burns, and Sidney the same age as a Playboy bunny ... at least that is how Keeshan — The Stud Muffin — sees her.

Keeshan has never even seen another dog, let alone a female dog, until we acquired Sidney. As far as he knew, he was the Robinson Crusoe of the dog world. However, when Sidney came on the scene, Keeshan, despite his advanced age, quickly switched from Sleep Mode to Full Mating Mode in roughly 0.5 dog seconds. He immediately became George Burns with Mick Jagger hormones.

Fortunately, Sidney has had all of her suspicious, female reproductive hardware removed; otherwise, we would now have about 50 billion furry little George Burns puppies running around the yard. Before Sidney arrived, Keeshan would only go into Mating Mode when we had visitors in the yard who unwittingly stood in one place for more than 1.37 dog seconds.

We had to keep a sign on the entrance to our fenced-in yard stating, "BEWARE: SMALL, FURRY ANIMAL THAT WILL MATE WITH ANYTHING LURKS HERE. KEEP MOVING!"

Keeshan has pretty much gotten Mating Mode out of his system, so to speak. (This is largely due to the fact that Sidney, like many human females, no longer tolerates Mating Mode.)

To be quite honest, I think Keeshan's feelings were hurt when he last tried to put the moves on her. Sidney just couldn't take it anymore and fell to the ground, rolled over onto her back, and laughed herself silly at the sight of this small hairball jumping in the air, barking, with his lower body rhythmically doing a perfect imitation of Elvis Presley.

While Keeshan is the Stud Machine,

Sidney is the Feeding Machine. Sidney is subconsciously in Feeding Mode all the time. Feeding Mode quite literally means she will eat anything, at any time, including significant structural parts of the house and any nearby, large national forests.

Notwithstanding the destruction, Keeshan and Sidney are excellent protectors of the home turf (what's left of it). I can't begin to count the number of times they have gone into Intruder Alert Mode at 3 a.m. on a windy night, barking furiously (BARK! BARK! BARK! BARK! DID YOU SEE THAT? BARK! OH MY GOD! ALERT! ALERT! BARK! BARK!) to let me know that half a dozen leaves have blown into the yard.

However, I am almost certain that if an actual human leaf were to blow into the yard at night, both dogs would immediately go into Full Reverse Thrust Mode and blow dog-shaped openings through the side of the house as they jump into bed with me.

Despite everything, Keeshan and Sidney are wonderful pets and would very much like to meet you.

Stop by and see them sometime. Bring lots of food. And whatever you do, KEEP MOVING.

Changes in KanWork reduce financial aid

Jeni Pruitt
staff reporter

Getting a four-year college degree will no longer be an option for K-State students participating in the Kansas Social Rehabilitation Services' KanWork program.

Revisions in KanWork will be officially announced Nov. 1 and will force students not graduating by December 1996 to change to a two-year degree program or they will lose their financial assistance.

For some students, this might mean dropping out of school entirely.

The KanWork Act, passed by the Kansas Legislature in 1988, was designed to help welfare recipients obtain self sufficiency.

The program pays for transportation, work tools, work clothes and day care so participants can receive skills training that will increase their chances of getting a job and becoming contributing taxpayers.

Although in the past, the program has approved clients who wish to acquire a baccalaureate degree, SRS directors will vote Friday on a final draft of a new proposal that would limit this aid to two-year degrees.

"All students who can complete their degrees by December 1996 will continue to receive full services from KanWork," said Connie Hubbell, Commissioner of Employee Maintenance and author of the proposal. "Everyone can continue to receive full services through the Spring of 1996."

For those who cannot complete their degree by December 1996, to continue to receive KanWork services, they must transfer to another component of KanWork.

KanWork offers other programs like On the Job Training Program and the Community Work Experience Program, that also help recipients develop job skills.

Students would also have the option of entering a two-year degree program at a technical school or a community college.

But regardless of which option the recipients choose, they must complete their designated training within 30 months to continue to receive KanWork benefits.

Ivan Katzenmeier, administrator of the Manhattan Employment Preparation Services, said the program has changed from a training program to an employment-first program. In other words, recipients will be encouraged to look for a job first to see if they need an education.

The shift is the result of the observation that 80 percent of jobs don't require college degrees, he said.

"We have Ph.D.s walking into our office and getting on welfare," Katzenmeier said. "Biology majors are saying that there are no jobs in Manhattan. So getting a college degree is not the solution."

The Kansas SRS programs are trying to encourage welfare recipients to take entry-level jobs, and if they stay on the job long enough, they might be able to get into management, depending on their skills and abilities, he said.

"If they don't have the ability to move up, they probably don't have the ability to finish college either," Katzenmeier said.

The policy change is also the result of public pressure.

"I think it's the philosophy of most people that students should have to pay for their college degree with some of their own earnings," Hubbell said.

The revisions were not made to save money, but to shift costs, Hubbell said.

"It's not a cost-saving policy as much as it is a cost shift," Hubbell said. "The money that we're currently spending on baccalaureate will go for more men and women to receive two-year degrees and work."

But not everyone agrees with the program's new philosophy.

Pam Bivons, junior in psychology and leader in a local movement against the reforms, said she disagrees with the new philosophy of the program.

"When Ivan told me that education is no longer a sufficient reason to receive public assistance, I was pissed," she said.

"They want to educate the poor enough so that they still have to strive and struggle to survive and work at all costs,

but don't educate them enough so that they can go and take their job."

She also said that by the time babysitters and transportation bills are paid, a minimum-wage job is insufficient.

"The whole environment has changed towards education — get them off public assistance and get them into a job," Bivons said.

"Whether these jobs can support them is not even considered."

Bivons said minimum wage jobs can not support a family.

"My husband and I figured out the expenses of me going back to work. It's not like we had 20 kids — we had two, and for a minimum-wage job, I would have brought home $20 a month," she said. "I refuse to go to work and have someone else raise my kids for what wouldn't even amount to one bag of groceries."

Bivons said she will be petitioning the reforms in the back of the K-State Student Union today.

"I will take the petition in myself and hand it to Connie Hubbell directly," she said.

Hubbell said she is open to any suggestions people have about the final policy.

"We've received lots of calls," Hubbell said. "I've documented every phone call I've had. Everything up until Friday morning I will answer."

Bivons said students need to get involved and inform Hubbell about how the proposal would affect them.

Iowa State tops Cats in 5 games

Shana Nowell
staff writer

It was another tough loss for the K-State volleyball team last night as it dropped its sixth match of the season to Iowa State.

The evening in Iowa was a case of déjà vu for the Cats as they repeated the Oct. 4 match against Iowa State, playing five long games and emerging without a win.

The Cats began the match by roaring onto the court, winning game one easily, 15-5.

But the Cyclones refused to blow away and started to whip themselves into shape in the second game, defeating the Cats 15-10.

It appeared as though the Cats might be able to defeat Iowa State when regained their lead, winning a close one in game three, 15-12.

Needing only to win one more game, the Cats failed to rally. Instead, they died out, allowing the Iowa State squad to win games four and five with scores of 15-10 and 15-13 respectively.

It was a case of the dying attack for K-State. The Cats outhit their opponents in the first game averaging .367, and the Cyclones hit a meager .029.

But by the end of the match, the tables had turned.

K-State hit .208, .222, .041 and .136 in each of its next four games. Meanwhile, Iowa State improved its average and remained relatively steady, hitting .320, .155, .146 and .217.

K-State is now 16-6 overall, with four of its losses coming in conference play. The team is 3-4 in the Big 8.

Iowa State has improved its record to 16-7 on the season and 6-1 in the Big 8. It has now moved into second place in the conference behind No. 1 Nebraska.

The K-State offense was led by junior play-setter Yolanda "Toie" Young. Young had a team-high 20 kills, hitting .261 for the match.

Junior middle blocker Kate DeClerk also contributed to the Wildcat attack with 19 kills, hitting .311.

Sophomore setter Devon Ryning posted another 65 set assists.

Defensively, the Cats were led by freshman hitter Kim Zschau, freshman blocker Val Wiek and Young.

Zschau had a team-high 20 digs in the match. To stop the Cyclone attack, Wiek and Young each had a solo block and six block assists.

Coach Jim Moore was unavailable for comment.

Yolanda "Toie" Young and Kelli Luther dive for a ball in a match earlier this season.

Arrests raise questions about game-day status

I called home Tuesday night as soon as I heard the news.

"Mom, guess what?" I said. "They've actually arrested three of our football players for beating up those guys and the dog. Listen closely so you can tell Dad and Cody. They arrested Brian Kavanagh, Nyle Wiren and Percell Gaskins."

I wasn't expecting her response to this late-breaking news flash.

"Oh, no. I hope Snyder doesn't suspend them this week. We'll need them for the KU game," she said in a desperate voice.

This from my mother, of all people, a mild-mannered substitute teacher, homemaker and mother of four. Who would have thought this woman, a woman who calmly bakes cookies while listening to K-State every Saturday, would condone these violent acts for the sake of a football game?

Then I spoke with one of my brothers at Fort Hays State. He was furious that the press uncovered this huge scandal in the first place.

"Why do you people in the press have to act like you work for the National Enquirer?" he said. "Why couldn't you just keep it quiet until after the season was over?"

These responses puzzled me. If my own normal, sane, all-American family thought these players shouldn't be punished during the season, I wondered what other K-State fans thought.

With that in mind, I did an informal survey of K-State students at the K-State Student Union, asking the question, "Should Bill Snyder suspend the players who were arrested Tuesday night?"

Needless to say, I was surprised at the responses I received.

"What happens off the playing field shouldn't affect their playing status," Todd Farrar, junior in management, said. "Snyder shouldn't do anything to them. They're already being punished by the law so they don't need to be punished twice."

This opinion proved to be the overwhelming response from people I polled.

"I'm not saying they're guilty or not guilty," Carolyn Fils-Aime, freshman in pre-health professions, said. "But Saturday is a big game, and they're star players, so I think they should play. I think Snyder should decide what to do to them after this weekend's game."

Another student also cited this weekend's KU game as one reason the athletes shouldn't be punished.

"I think they should play," Brian Jenkins, senior in construction science, said. "They did it a long time ago. And plus, I hate KU. I don't want to lose."

Others said since the players arrested haven't been proven guilty, they shouldn't be punished.

"I believe a person is innocent until proven guilty," Chauna Agosto, senior in marketing, said. "It wouldn't be fair for Snyder to take action against them if they haven't been proven guilty."

Ironically, a friend of the men who were allegedly assaulted said he still thought the athletes arrested should play.

"The guys it happened to were in my house," Chris Brigdon, junior in accounting, said. "So I want these players to hang. But I think the law should punish them, not Snyder."

"The guys it happened to were in my house. So I want these players to hang. But I think the law should punish them, not Snyder."

CHRIS BRIGDON
JUNIOR IN ACCOUNTING

Out of the 10 students I polled, I found only one person who thought the players should be suspended from the team.

"If any other student on campus would have done this, they would have suffered the consequences," Aaron Towns, senior in finance, said. "They committed a crime, so they should suffer punishment. Snyder's a good coach, so I think he'll make a good decision."

As for my own feelings about this issue, I'm torn. The football fan in me doesn't want to see these players suspended. I want to see us beat KU, and I want to see us go to another bowl game. I also agree with some students I surveyed that these men are innocent until proven guilty, so I can't justify a suspension until that has been done.

On the other hand, what if the men these athletes supposedly assaulted had been my brothers? What if they had been my friends? I know I would want whomever was responsible for hurting them to be punished.

But right now, there are so many rumors circulating about the incident that we don't know exactly who is guilty and who is innocent. The law has already decided who it wants to punish, whether they're guilty or not.

Now it's Coach Snyder's turn.

► K-STATE VS. KANSAS FOOTBALL

Special teams play will be big in upcoming Sunflower Showdown

Ryan O'Halloran
staff writer

Big plays win big games, and that's why the special teams could play huge roles in Saturday's game between sixth-ranked Kansas and 14th-ranked K-State.

In last week's games, K-State ran two fake punts against Nebraska, and Kansas ran one in its 38-17 win against Oklahoma. Both teams put a high emphasis on the specialty teams, and the statistics point that out.

Kansas (7-0) ranks first in the Big 8 in net punting, punt returns, kickoff returns and punting. K-State (6-1) is in the top half of the conference in all of those categories. Last season, Kansas was first in punt and kickoff returns, and K-State was second and third in those areas respectively.

"We put a pretty high priority on it," Kansas coach Glen Mason said. "We've always worked hard on special teams, and we've put a couple of different approaches to it."

"I got a guy who's a head coach of each special team. I give them a lot of latitude in that area. They get to call the shots, and that's put a little bit more fun into planning it for those individuals."

On the Kansas staff, wide receiver coach Vic Adame coaches the punt team, secondary coach David Gibbs coaches the punt return and punt block teams, running backs coach Reggie Mitchell has the kickoff team, and outside linebackers coach Tim Phillips handles the kickoff coverage unit.

"Vic has my punt team, and he's responsible for all phases of the punt team — selection of personnel, what we're doing — we all know what's going on, and we're all involved, but he calls the shots," Mason said.

Late in the third quarter against Oklahoma last week, punter Darin Simmons ran 45 yards on the fake punt to give KU the ball on the OU

15. That run led to a 26-yard field goal by Jeff McCord to give KU its first lead of the game at 17-14.

Last season, Simmons was fifth in the Big 8 with a 39.07-yard average, but this season, the senior leads the conference and is third in the nation with a 46.12 average.

"I think what makes Kansas the quality football team they are now is that they have great balance — offense, defense, kicking game, run, pass — they're balanced in all aspects," K-State coach Bill Snyder said.

Against Nebraska, K-State punter James Garcia auditioned for the quarterback position by completing two passes on fake punts for 30 yards. The freshman, who is fourth in the conference in punting, completed passes over the middle to wide open Dederick Kelly for 18 yards and Mario Smith for 12 yards.

Late in the game, K-State's Gordon Brown blocked a Nebraska punt that was picked up by Clyde Johnson for a K-State touchdown.

If the game is close, like most think it will be, field position will be key — that means the performance of the return and coverage teams will be vital.

► CONFERENCE CHAMPIONSHIP

Big 12 delays playoff decision

Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Big 12 athletic directors took no action on a proposed championship football game Wednesday, saying they wanted to get more information from ABC on how much it was willing to pay to televise the game.

The athletic directors said they would meet Nov. 14 with ABC in Dallas.

"You have to keep in mind that if you're going to start this thing, you're going to have to do it right," Big 12 commissioner Steve Hatchell said after the meeting.

"If you're going to do this, you have to be sure the money is right, the TV is right and the planning and hoopla is right."

ABC apparently has offered $2.5 million for a championship game between the winners of the new conference's two divisions. The league — which is being formed by the additions of Texas, Texas A&M, Texas Tech and Baylor to the Big 8 — begins play next season.

There is an incomplete picture of the TV offer, Hatchell said. "We just need a better indication of where the money is."

"The whole issue of the rights fee is central to the discussion," Hatchell said. "Everyone is mindful of the time, but you've got to do it right."

Presidents of the new Big 12 schools are to meet Nov. 30 in Kansas City and would want to make a decision at that time. The presidents have given tentative approval to the game pending further study by the athletic directors.

The site of the game is also still to be determined.

St. Louis and Houston have been said to be the frontrunners, but Kansas City and Dallas have also made bids.

Hatchell, and Kansas athletic director Bob Frederick said there was no serious talk about the site.

The University of Nebraska, which is getting into the derby late, did make a formal presentation.

"We decided there are some issues that we need to settle with our TV people," said Frederick, who heads group of athletic directors. "We made no decisions, took no votes. We had meaningful discussions about the playoff."

Many coaches, most notably Tom Osborne of Nebraska, are opposed to the playoff. They fear the loser of the playoff will be denied a bowl game it otherwise might have gotten an invitation to.

University presidents, however, welcome the payoff the game will bring.

Frederick said the athletic directors also discussed bowl guidelines the new conference has adopted even though it does not begin play until next year.

The guidelines call for the conference champion to go to the bowl alliance, which consists of the Fiesta, Orange and Sugar bowls.

Once the alliance fills its openings, the Big 12 requires the Cotton, Holiday, Alamo, Aloha and Copper bowls to choose the available team with the best record within one victory or one within five places in the coaches poll.

A bowl could bypass a 9-2 team, for example, for an 8-3 team or any team ranked with five places of the 9-2 team.

Frederick said the athletic directors decided to be more flexible in the guidelines, but declined to give specifics.

Maybe the guy just had to whizz like a racehorse

The person in charge of checking racehorses for illegal drugs at the Jockey Club of Southern Africa has been suspended. The official in question created a flap when human DNA showed up in a horse's urine sample. The horse couldn't produce a sample so a groomsmen allegedly obliged. Johnnie Cochran might want to investigate whether the human DNA was actually planted in the urine sample.

And while we're dogging on the lawyers ...

The ad shows a woman in a miniskirt played on a desk urging prospective clients to "Try this non-conforming law firm." The woman is attorney Rosalie Osias of the New York suburb of Great Neck. She came up with the ad in order to attract business in the tightly knit world of mortgage banking. "I needed something sexual to get them to notice," she said in a recent Associated Press story. Osias claimed that since her ad campaign began, her business has increased 1,000 percent. The ads don't say whether her legal services are for out-call or in-call clients, or both.

Just because they're paranoid, doesn't mean they're not right

The United Nations celebrated 50 years of existence this week. The organization, which has done everything from help eradicate smallpox to authorize non-declared wars around the world, has come under fire from some American conservatives who view the United Nations as a threat to U.S. sovereignty. Supporters of the United Nations believe these folks are paranoid. They point to conservative conspiracy theories that, among other things, allege that Russian troops will soon be training on American soil. In other news, Russian troops will be arriving at Wichita's McConnell Air Force Base and are scheduled to begin training at Fort Riley any day now.

Another case of 'physician, heal thyself'

An anger management counselor in Honolulu might have enraged more people than he's helped. A man was sent by a family court to seek counseling from Charles Mahuka and chose to show up to his first session drunk. Mahuka was allegedly so upset by the man's drunken behavior that he lost his temper and physically attacked him. Now the would-be client is brain dead. Mahuka will face murder charges if the man is declared legally dead. If convicted, Mahuka will probably share a prison cell with a sexual-abuse counselor who has a similar rapport with his clients.

First there was New York. Then came Los Angeles, San Francisco and London in rapid succession.

In 1996, the city of choice is Miami, and "The Real World 5" is setting up a casting call.

In the past, the show has consisted of months of living with several people and having your life taped for a docu-drama on what happens when people "stop being polite and start getting real."

The 1996 show will consist of opening and operating a small business with your roommates. The group is expected to rely on their own sources of income until the business starts to turn a profit.

Once the taping is complete, the roommates will have the opportunity to continue running the business.

MTV is asking for people who have backgrounds in business management, entrepreneurship, creativity, computers, marketing and sales to apply.

The first step in the application process is producing an interview videotape.

"They need to tell as much about themselves as possible," Cosmo Mastropolo, MTV publicity, said. "They need to pretend they're talking to their best friend and catching them up on everything that's happening to them."

After the videotape is viewed, the producers pick the tapes they like and send those people applications.

"After the videotape is reviewed, they are called, and the phone conversation is videotaped," Mastropolo said. "After that, everyone meets in a city, and the final interviews are conducted. Then they pick the cast."

MTV has recently published a book called "The Real World," and it contains an application, as well as a history of the show, biographies of cast members and excerpts from cover letters of other cast members.

Mastropolo suggested people buy the book if they want to include an application with their videotape.

If you are interested in renting a camcorder to tape your video application, Conde's Audio and Video is the only place in Manhattan or Junction City that rents camcorders.

"We have full-size VHS," Craig Claassen, Conde's employee, said. "The rental costs $20 a day, and I need a credit card that can run a $500 authorization for a deposit."

One K-State student said she liked the episodes set in San Francisco the best and would be rather conservative if she applied.

"I wouldn't go real far to get on it," Nicole Svanda, freshman in pre-veterinary medicine, said. "But I would like to be on it."

Another student said she also liked the show.

"I think it's very down-to-earth. It's right there all the time. It shows conflict. It shows everything isn't peachy-keen all the time," Kendra Travis, junior in criminal justice, said.

However, Travis said she definitely wouldn't want to be on the show.

"You lose all your privacy for a year. I cannot imagine having all your phone calls taped and having a camera on me all the time."

HOW TO APPLY

- You must be between the ages of 18 and 26.
- Send a five-10 minute videotape to:
The Real World - Miami
Casting Office
10 Universal City Plaza,
33rd floor
Universal City, Calif., 91608
- The outside of the tape should be marked with your name, address, age and telephone number. The deadline is Nov. 15.

Final allocations almost set

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

Student Senate is finishing the final eight allocations for the spring semester next Thursday.

Student organizations receiving money from Senate have to follow guidelines and go through the allocations process to be eligible to receive funds from the student activities line-item fee.

Chris Avila, Senate Allocations Committee chairman and Senate treasurer, said groups must be registered with the University Activities Board in order to receive money from student activity line-item fees.

UAB registered groups can then fill out a Student Governing Association budget request form, Avila said.

Budget request forms for regular allocations that take place in the fall and spring semesters are due the fourth Friday in September or January by 4 p.m. in the Office of Student Activities and Services.

During the fall semester, finance information workshops are planned to help student groups wade through the paperwork and to explain the allocations process.

Budget request forms include the name of the organization, a contact person and phone number and the project and money requested in each of the categories listed on the form.

"Budget requests for events that will happen the following semester go through the regular allocations process," Avila said.

Regular allocation budget requests take precedence over special allocation requests, he said. Regular allocations are made and approved before special requests because regular allocations are made the semester before the event occurs.

Groups need to explain the plan for the project or speaker and provide some information regarding who will be speaking to the Allocations Committee concerning the project.

Informal Guidelines

These are this semester's informal guidelines for Student Senate allocations. Informal guidelines are the maximum amount of money student groups can get from student government.

- Honorarium: $650 and one speaker per project. A $1,000 cap for a special month.
- Photocopies: 250 maximum per project.
- Telephone or fax: $5 per project.
- Collegian ads: one 2 column by 4 inch advertisement per speaker, two ads per week, four ads per month, four ads per project.
- Films: two per group.
- Rental of equipment: $250 maximum per project.
- Rental of space: $500 maximum per project.

When a group asks for money, the Allocations Committee may take into account the overall effect of the program, whether admission will be charged, if open to all students, if any fundraising has been done toward the cost of the project and if the group will be receiving money from another source.

* Informal guidelines don't apply to special allocations.

JUSTIN STAHLMAN/Collegian

"If they are requesting money for the present semester or if the request is for any type of conference where travel is involved, then both of those would be considered special requests," Avila said.

Special allocations are made on a case by case basis, and the amount of money in the account determines the size of the allocation.

When a group asks for money, the Allocations Committee may take into account the overall effect of the program, whether admission will be charged, if the activity will be open to all students, if any fundraising has been done toward the cost of the project and if the group will be receiving money from another source.

Except for the academic competition teams, organizations may receive money from only one fee source. The fee sources include the Student Activity Fee, College Councils or the Fine Arts Fee.

"As a committee, we kind of obligate ourselves to follow the informal guidelines," Avila said. "Informals change from semester to semester."

The SGA funding regulations are also a guideline for the committee and Senate. The funding regulations are available to all student organizations through the Office of Student Activities and Services.

After the committee reviews the budget request, it makes a recommendation based on the informal guidelines and the funding regulations.

"The fourth step is to forward the committee's recommendations to Student Senate for approval," Avila said.

An allocations bill is given first readings one week and is voted on during a second reading the following week, he said.

"In first readings, the bill is read the first time, and any questions about the allocation are answered," Avila said. "Then it is held over for second readings the next week."

When an allocations bill comes up for second readings, it is important for the group to have a representative present to answer questions, he said.

Linear fee-payment implementation method to be decided by committee

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

Some students might have to pay more in student fees under a linear fee-payment system next fall.

K-State administration decided to implement linear fees after the Kansas Board of Regents adopted linear tuition.

Linear tuition and linear fees are scheduled to start in fall 1996. The committee charged with determining how to implement linear fees will make its decision today.

"The whole goal of this plan is to make something that is revenue-neutral," said Mark Tomb, Student Senate Privilege Fee Committee chairman.

Tomb serves on the University committee charged with determining how the linear fees will be implemented.

The committee is looking at two options for implementing linear fees, Bob Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, said.

"One option would be to take the amount of fees and divide by 15, and that would be the per-credit-hour charge," Krause said.

For example, the current fee level of $216.45 would be divided by 15 credit hours, the proposed cap for determining fee rates, and students would pay $14.43 per credit hour.

Some of the committee members expressed concern that the straight linear-fee system would let some students take one credit hour and still use all the services.

The second option would help eliminate this problem. Krause said the committee has looked at charging $50 for the first credit hour and then a linear rate of $16.15 up to a cap at 12 hours. The total amount paid in fees would then be $227.65.

MEETING TIME

► The committee that is discussing the linear fee proposal is meeting at 8 a.m. in the Anderson Hall Conference Room.

Tomb said the committee agreed to a cap at 12 hours.

The average number of credit hours a student takes at K-State is 13.7, he said. The average is 12.8 when graduate students are added in.

The committee is proposing a 3-percent increase in fees with the second option because they are expecting fewer credit hours will be taken with the linear-tuition system, Tomb said.

Although students who take 12 hours or more would be paying more in fees, some students taking fewer hours would be paying less under linear fee payment.

One issue that has not been resolved by the committee is how the fee review process will be structured for the Privilege Fee Committee once linear fees have been implemented, Tomb said.

With the linear fee system, all the fee money will go into one account and will be allocated to campus services on a percentage basis. For budgeting purposes, the percentages will be based on the enrollment figures and budget from the previous year.

Tomb said he did not know what will happen when enrollment increases. If enrollment increases, more money than was budgeted will be generated.

The organizations that receive student money might automatically receive more funding. This is how enrollment increases are handled now.

Money from enrollment increases might stay in the privilege fee account, and privilege-fee services could ask for an increased allocation from that account.

Tomb said he thought the current system made sense because services would need more money to accommodate increased enrollment.

"Normally, money coming into the entity with increased enrollment would be kept by them," Tomb said.

Krause said linear fee payment opens up the possibility for the privilege-fee group to set expenditure limits on campus services.

Another concern raised by Matt Soldner, Senate Long Term Planning chairman, was the refund system for tuition and fees during drop/add.

Spikes occur in drop/add in the fifth and 10th weeks of class. Until the University stops giving out refunds, the money cannot be allocated from the fee account. Services could be without funds for several weeks during the semester.

Krause said he did not think the lag time would be a problem because the funds could be allocated based on what the enrollment figures were the year before.

Although a little more math will be involved, students will still be able to figure out how much money they pay for each service on campus because the allocations will be based on a percentage rate.

Krause said he did not see any disadvantages in switching systems. "No matter what you do, you'll have inequities," he said.

► SPEECH

First 5 years most important in children's futures

Nikola Zytrow
staff reporter

Empowering kids with encouragement and patience at an early age is the key to eliminating many of the problems of today's youth and tomorrow's adults, Bob Keeshan said in a speech Wednesday in Topeka.

Keeshan, who played TV's beloved character Captain Kangaroo, presented "Growing Up Happy" at the 19th-annual Governor's Conference for the Prevention of Child Abuse and Neglect.

Keeshan

He spoke about the significant effect of the first five years of children's lives on their later prospects in life.

"I've been advocating for children and their needs for about 40 years now," Keeshan told an audience of about 800 parents, professionals and volunteers who work with children every day.

Some of the biggest problems the country is facing, such as drug abuse, delinquency and violence, are the direct result of how we treat children in the first five years of their lives, Keeshan said.

This can be due to physical abuse, emotional abuse or just a neglectful style of parenting, he said. Instead of spending time with our children, we tell them to watch television, he said.

It is on television that children often first learn about adult subjects like sex. Keeshan said talk shows such as Sally Jesse Raphael introduce kids to outrageous subjects, which gives children a distorted outlook on the world.

"It's not exactly Little Red Riding Hood, but our kids are just as fascinated," Keeshan said.

A child who is neglected or abused might easily succumb to temptations like drugs, which promise to make them feel good, he said.

▶ VEGETARIANS

New menu options appeal to students

Becky Sheridan
staff reporter

The Department of Housing and Dining Services is offering a new twist to its menu — vegetarian foods.

Vegetarian students who live in the residence halls and eat in Derby, Kramer and Van Zile dining centers can get the usual cheese pizza or grilled cheese sandwich, but now they can try something different like couscous and ratatouille.

There is also black bean casserole, tofu stir fry and garden burgers, but these are only a few of the different foods being offered to vegetarians at the centers.

"We were doing a very little bit of vegetarian food five or 10 years ago, and it has grown a lot due to student interest," said Barbara Scheule, administrative dietitian of Housing and Dining Services. "The more things we try, the more response we get."

Fern Mayfield, food service supervisor for housing and dining services, said she looks for things that will be accepted by everyone, not just vegetarians.

"The number of students who eat this kind of food is on the rise," Scheule said. "They are the ones coming to our meetings and requesting certain foods and giving us ideas."

Brigetta Sandquist, freshman in pre-veterinary medicine, said she has been a vegetarian for three years.

"I think they do a pretty good job of offering vegetarian food," she said. "The variety is OK, and they do offer a lot of pasta, which I really like."

Mary Molt, assistant director of housing and dining services, said a lot of non-vegetarians eat the food, too.

"We've really developed a lot of non-meat pasta recipes that all students are eating," Molt said. "They may not be vegetarians all the time but are just looking for something a little lighter to eat."

Scheule said the cheese and pasta dishes are the most popular because everyone eats them.

Mayfield said the dietitians are also trying to develop more low-fat recipes, using more grains and beans rather than eggs and cheese.

"I think students are more exposed to the concept of wellness and are willing to try new things," Molt said, "and that is what we are giving them."

The availability and publicity of vegetarian dishes has also helped to increase awareness, Molt said.

"More meatless dishes have been promoted, and there's more access to this kind of food from suppliers," Molt said. "This availability is driven by requests."

Scheule said there are two types of vegetarians — those who don't eat meat, eggs or milk products, and those who don't eat meat but permit milk and eggs.

"We started breaking our products down into two categories to avoid confusion," Scheule said. "Our meals with no meat, eggs or milk are labeled with a V, and our meatless meals with eggs or milk are marked with an M."

Program benefits at-risk military children

Jennifer Burdoo
staff writer

Civilian technicians working with a support project for at-risk youth on military bases are training this week with the help of a program designed by a K-State professor.

The project, named the USDA/Army School-age and Teen Project, will aid the children of military personnel on bases across the United States as well as in Germany and the Pacific. The program is directed by the Department of Defense.

K-State, Cornell University and the University of Arizona are a few of the schools involved in the program.

"This is a global project," said Marcia McFarland, associate professor of the School of Family Studies and Human Services and director of the training sector of the program.

The training program, which took five months to develop, involves a two-week, 80-hour program for the involved personnel. It is funded by a $2.8-million grant from the U.S. Department of Agriculture, she said.

The project is designed to help students who are deprived of some educational and parental support.

"We know it is more cost-effective to prepare children to live productive lives than it is to provide remediation to halt nonproductive behaviors," McFarland said. "It will support a more active citizenry."

Melody Vance, assistant to the project director at Fort Monroe, Va., said, "We're directing them in a way that will keep them out of risk."

The project is a pilot version, and only 50 bases will be involved, but more bases might be added in the future.

Although a K-State department is helping train the civilian personnel involved in the program, K-State students are not involved in the project. The closest military base involved is Fort Leavenworth.

The project is divided into three general tasks, McFarland said.

Task one organizes the project and includes the training of personnel, establishing computer labs and gathering support materials for the project.

Tasks two and three involve the execution of the project. Task two concentrates on working with school-age children, and task three will focus on teen-agers.

The project will help kids with schoolwork and computer skills, and help families work together and support each themselves.

"All youth are at risk," Vance said.

Christy Ally, who works at Fort Leavenworth in the Supplemental Programs and Services Office, said the base has 96 children enrolled in the program.

Of those, Ally said, she expects about 70 kids to come in for the project every day.

Ally said the program's emphasis is generally on creativity rather than just homework.

"Games and clubs are going to be involved," she said.

The Fort Leavenworth program will begin in August and is planned to operate at least two years.

SENATE

tor would have gone before Tribunal. Tribunal would have heard the case and then decided whether the senator should be removed from Senate.

Potter said the by-laws and constitution were violated, and he said he believed sponsoring a bill himself was the only way to rectify the situation.

He said the committee's debate included information about Henry's personality and that discussion should have been ruled out of order.

He said if the bill made it to the Senate floor, he would rule any discussion of Henry's personality out of order.

"I would make it crystal clear that discussion of personality and things besides the issue of nonfeasance are not going to be discussed. They are not germane and would be ruled out of order," he said.

Potter said the decision set a dangerous precedent and would make enforcement of the absence policy difficult.

Henry said he believed he was being placed in double jeopardy and the chair had overstepped his bonds.

He said Potter's action was an insult to the committee.

"The members of the committee interpreted the constitution and voted their conscience and what they thought was fair," he said.

Henry said he wants to continue to be a senator.

"I'm going to fight this," Henry said. "I worked too hard for too many years to give it up."

Darcie Allen, Senate Operations Committee chair, said it was in Potter's power to sponsor the impeachment bill.

However, all legislation must be considered by the committee before it goes to the Senate floor for second readings and a vote.

The legislation would be up for first reading at next Thursday's Senate meeting. The bill would be up for consideration by the committee the following Monday.

The committee could choose to recommend the bill favorably, unfavorably or hold it in committee.

Allen said she hoped the committee would not try to hold the bill and hoped it would be debated on the Senate floor.

However, she said she did not think the committee was outside its power when it decided there were not grounds for impeachment.

Potter said he thought the committee did not understand its job when it made its decision. He said he would be requesting a constitutional interpretation from Tribunal concerning the role of Senate and the operations committee in impeachment proceedings.

Ben Clouse, Tribunal chancellor, said Tribunal would consider Potter's request the beginning of next week, provided all the members of Tribunal were able to meet.

ALLOCATE

Keen said he was contacted by Franquemont after the KSUARH allocation was tabled in committee earlier in the semester. Franquemont told him the allocation was tabled because no representative from KSUARH was present, Keen said.

Franquemont told Keen that he or Chris Avila, Allocations Committee chairman, would call him and tell him about the next meeting. Keen did not get a phone call from Franquemont or Avila, he said.

"I have never been invited to one of those meetings," Keen said.

He said he was also not told about the finance workshops put on by the Allocations Committee for groups submitting budget requests to Senate.

Avila said the meetings were mandatory for anyone who will be spending student government money.

Technically, groups cannot spend the money allocated to them without attending the workshops.

"We normally go over the process itself, and we go over all the guidelines," Avila said.

The Allocations Committee will be having one last meeting for those groups that were not in attendance at the original workshops but were allocated funds by Senate, he said. The time and date for that meeting has not been set.

Keen said Avila called the KSUARH adviser in September and said the group was now eligible to receive funds from Student Governing Association.

Keen said he thought the adviser asked Avila what events the group could get money for, and she was told any of their normal programs would be fine.

"The thing that gets me is that we lost out on funding because we did not know the procedures," Keen said.

KSUARH sponsors other events that do comply with guidelines, but because the group did not know about the guidelines before submitting the budget request, the group did not ask for funding for those projects.

"I could have asked for money for any of our other programs," Keen said.

Potter said one reason KSUARH lost funding for Spring Fling is that Senate does not have a concrete definition of what a social event is.

"The guidelines were revamped last year, but they are still very open to interpretation," he said.

Because the committee has not turned away any group that asked for funding for events that might be considered social, Potter said he has been forced to make rulings on the Senate floor.

"Instead of a committee making a ruling, it's me making a ruling," Potter said. "That's not good."

He said the definition of a social event needs to be spelled out in the funding guidelines so future Senates and Allocations Committees will not have to interpret what is or is not a social event according to the guidelines.

"We see a problem, and now we need to fix it," he said.

The social event guideline was not the only obstacle for KSUARH's allocation. Two weeks before the allocation was brought before Senate, the KSUARH general body voted to charge all non-residence hall participants in preregistered events $3 to participate.

One of the criteria senators use in determining whether a group will receive funding for an event is whether the event will be free to all K-State students.

"We knew that was going to be an issue," Keen said.

He said Spring Fling does not have preregistered events so the charge would not apply.

"Had we known the regulations before we voted, it might have changed our opinion on charging for events," he said.

Avila said his committee has voted to send several events before Senate that were not clearly prohibited by the funding guidelines. Avila said his reason for doing this was so the body could decide whether the group would be funded or not.

"The whole idea of student government is to teach about government," Avila said.

"It's interesting to bring up an issue and see what happens."

Although Avila said he is not trying to set precedents, many of the trial balloons sent up by the committee have passed.

Trent LeDoux, agriculture senator, said he did not like the trial balloon method of allocating money.

"We've been getting a lot of bills sent to us as trial balloons," LeDoux said. "Doing something to see if we catch it is a bad way to govern."

He said he thought the committee needed to apply the guidelines instead of asking the body or the Senate chairman to do so.

"If we need to change the guidelines, then we should do it," he said.

The funding guidelines are actually decided by the old Senate in April before the newly elected senators take office.

"That's just wrong," LeDoux said. "It ties our hands."

He said he has seen Senate fight not over funding an organization but over the funding guidelines during allocations this fall.

"The problem is our own," he said.

The funding guidelines need to be rewritten to allow funding for worthwhile events, LeDoux said. Groups that request money that does not fit the guidelines can go through the special allocation process to receive funds, he said.

LeDoux said he thought those events should either be written into the guidelines so they could be dealt with during regular allocations or the requests should be denied.

LeDoux said he did not agree with the practice of calling student groups and telling them there is free money available from Senate if they apply for it.

"We have to make them aware of all the rules," LeDoux said. "It's definitely not student groups' faults."

Somewhere along our financial chain of events, he said, telling groups what is going on has to become a top priority.

PLAYERS

"If there's enough evidence to arrest them then they should be suspended just for being involved with something like that," Holt said. "I know it's like saying that just because someone committed a crime they can't play football, but on the other hand, it's just like when the biology students got caught cheating — it made the University look bad."

Jason Duncan, sophomore in civil engineering, said he believes this incident could cause the football team to be in a bad light, but not the entire University.

"You have to look at the whole situation," Duncan said. "It doesn't help K-State's reputation, but it's not the only black spot."

Although Beth McFadden, sophomore in early childhood education, said she does not believe the incident makes K-State look bad, she said the players should be suspended from the KU game.

"It doesn't tarnish the school's image," McFadden said. "It reflects on the individuals, not the college."

Derek Settle, junior in horticulture, said he believes the players should be dealt with in the courts and then face punishment from Snyder if they are guilty.

"I think due process should play a role here," Settle said. "They need to have a day in court before action is taken. If they're found guilty, then they should take them off the team."

Angela DeRossi, freshman undecided, said she believes the fact that players were arrested the week of the KU game is not a coincidence.

"Timing had something to do with it," DeRossi said. "They are the most important players. This is the most controversial game. If they were going to do it, they should've done it a long time ago," she said.

Duncan said he is confused as to why the arrests happened when they did, but he said he doesn't believe the game Saturday had any influence.

"Do I think the police had an agenda to make the arrests four days before the game? No, I don't think that," Duncan said.

CAPTAIN

this," Keeshan said.

Children should be encouraged to feel good about themselves at home instead of looking to the streets and drugs. Keeshan said a parent can even do this on a trip to the supermarket by getting their child involved in this seemingly ordinary chore.

The way to deal with the problem of juvenile misbehavior is definitely not through building new prisons and hiring more lawyers and judges, Keeshan said.

"We tell ourselves that by doing this, we're solving the drug problem," Keeshan said, "but we're dealing with the symptoms rather than the underlying causes."

"There's only one solution," Keeshan said. "No users, no sellers."

If our country spent a fraction of the money it spent on the prison system, putting it into prevention efforts, the results would benefit everyone, Keeshan said.

Keeshan recalled being asked how children have changed over the last 10 years.

"Children have not changed in the last decade. They still ask the same questions: 'Who am I? Am I loved? What does the future hold?' What has changed in the last decade is the way we answer those questions," he said.

"The reality of America is very different from the rhetoric of America," Keeshan said.

America is a country in which one of every five children lives in poverty, Keeshan said.

The situation does not improve because politicians are not interested enough in securing the rights of children, he said.

"Children, you see, do not vote," Keeshan said.

"Politicians show little concern for children except when it comes to election time," he said. "We are the only nation in the world to do this to our children."

Except for their flags, it was difficult to distinguish between Russian and U.S. soldiers as they stood at attention at the opening ceremonies Thursday for the first ever U.S.-Russian joint training exercises on U.S. soil.

After years of Cold War, animosity between the United States and Russia, 150 soldiers from each country will be training at Fort Riley through Nov. 2 as a part of Peacekeeper 1995.

Soldiers from the U.S. 3rd Infantry Division stationed in Germany and 1st Infantry Division from Fort Riley will join troops from the Russian 27th Guards Motorized Rifle Division for the training exercises.

TRIAL

Man convicted of stalking K-State student

Claudette Riley
staff writer

A conviction was returned Wednesday in the stalking case of a K-State student.

The jury took two hours to convict Andrew Wilson, Junction City resident, in the first stalking trial in Riley County since the Kansas legislature amended the law in 1994 to upgrade the crime to a felony.

Melissa Hood, became acquainted with Hood while he was a customer at First Bank, 701 Poyntz Ave., where she worked as a bank teller.

"He started calling me at home after a couple weeks," Hood said. "I almost quit school and almost quit my job. I just didn't go out and stayed out of the public eye."

A couple weeks after the initial incident, Hood reported the harassment to the Riley County Police Department.

"The police department, the investigator's office and the Riley county prosecution have been very helpful," Hood said. "I would say that if (anyone) felt they were being harassed or stalked, they should definitely report it."

Hood repeatedly told Wilson she was not interested in dating him. After Wilson was arrested and police told him to cease contact with Hood, he began sending her letters and continued going to her residence.

By legal definition, stalking is an intentional and malicious following or course of conduct as a specific person when such following or course of conduct seriously alarms, annoys or harasses the person and which serves no legitimate purpose.

Wilson was recently convicted in Geary and Pottawatomie counties for stalking other women.

Batten down the hatches

Snow fences and blue uniforms will be a familiar sight in Aggieville Saturday.

The Riley County Police department is collaborating with K-State and KU police and the Kansas Highway Patrol, Capt. Allen Raynor, commander of patrol division with RCPD, said. "All we do is handle the people once they leave the Bramlage parking lots," he said. When it comes to Aggieville and Manhattan, RCPD has made special provisions for this weekend, Raynor said.

"At halftime we will be erecting rope barriers along with snow fencing, and Moro Street and 12th Street will be blocked off," he said.

Another provision RCPD is taking is that there will be no parking in Aggieville all day on Saturday, he said.

People entering the Aggieville area will have to go through a gate entrance, and officers will be looking for alcohol or hard containers, such as Pepsi cans, beer bottles and plastic containers, Raynor said.

"We just want to make sure things do not get out of hand," he said.

The RCPD has been enforcing these measures for the last six years during the KU-K-State games, he said.

"We are not stopping people from celebrating, just giving those who want to come to Aggieville a safe atmosphere," Raynor said.

Thursday and Friday night the RCPD will have an extra patrol out looking for Jayhawk activity,

Raynor said. "People should take precautions against their property,"

FOOD

Cats for Cans asks for food

Sarah Lunday
campus editor

Dozens of students across campus are steadily working to feed Manhattan's hungry residents during the holiday season.

"Manhattan does have problems, although it does seem like a happy-go-lucky place," Amy Bartel, senior in architectural engineering, said.

Riley County has a 21.2-percent poverty rate, Shirley Bramhall, director of the Flint Hills Breadbasket, said.

Bartel, chairperson for Cats for Cans, is helping students raise food for the holiday season.

Each year, Cats for Cans, the Mayor's Holiday Tree and the Flint Hills Breadbasket organize hundreds of students, organizations and business across the community to help feed the hungry in the area.

Last year, K-State students raised 79,000 pounds of food through Cats for Cans, and this year the unofficial goal is to top last year's amount, Bartel said.

"Cats for Cans is what makes the Thanksgiving baskets possible," Bartel said.

During the holiday season, school-aged children who usually receive free or reduced lunches at school might not receive adequate nutrition because they are not getting school lunches, Bramhall said.

Thirty-two percent of USD 383's students receive free and reduced lunches, according to a 1995 Mayor's Holiday Tree Report.

Students will have an opportunity to donate food to Cats for Cans throughout the next month.

At the Nov. 4 homecoming game, students can take cans of food for donation. And at every home basketball game before Christmas, fans can donate cans of food.

Students are also organizing a wide variety of projects to help gather food for the holidays.

Projects include collecting cans of food in the residence halls and on Halloween. The College of Business will be offering extra credit in some classes for students who bring cans of food to class.

Many other projects are in the works and will take place during November and December, Bartel said.

K-State alumni discuss their efforts with Ebola

Nancy Jaax

Heather Stephany
staff reporter

The dangers of the Ebola virus were scrutinized by two experts at Forum Hall Thursday night.

"The Ebola virus is alive and well," said Nancy Jaax, Colonel in the United States Army Veterinary Corps.

Nancy and her husband, Jerry, also a Colonel in the United States Army Veterinary Corps, both worked directly with the Reston, Va., outbreak in 1989 and were central characters in Richard Preston's best-seller "The Hot Zone."

The two K-State veterinary school graduates returned to campus for the first Donald C. Kelley Lectureship to tell about their experience with the Ebola virus outbreak.

In 1967, 1976 and 1979, outbreaks of the Ebola virus claimed hundreds of human lives in African countries, Nancy Jaax said.

Although other strains of the Ebola virus have killed hundreds of people in Africa, the Reston outbreak affected only primates.

"No one got sick. No one sniffled. No one died," Jerry Jaax said. "This case really generated more questions than answers."

LINEAR FEES

Linear fees capped at 12 hours

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

Students taking one to four credit hours or seven to 11 credit hours will be paying less in student fees next fall.

The Campus Privilege Fee Proposal Committee met Thursday morning and agreed on the flat rate for one credit hour and the linear fee rate with a cap at 12 hours.

The one-credit-hour rate will be $50. A $16.15 rate will be charged per credit hour from two hours to 12 hours of credit.

"We had to make sure a flat fee for one credit hour and a linear fee up to a 12 hour cap and a flat fee above that would generate enough revenue," said Tom Schellhardt, associate vice president for administration and finance.

The linear-fee system is expected to generate $2,000 more than the current system. It will raise more than $7.5 million.

"We're still able to generate the amount of revenue we need based on enrollment patterns," said Tom Rawson, vice president for administration and finance.

Full-time students paid $216.45 in privilege fees in fall 1995. In fall 1996, a student taking 12 or more hours will pay $227.65.

"I think we've held true to the fee rate staying close to the current fee rate," Schellhardt said.

Beginning in fall 1996, campus services will receive a fixed amount of the total revenue generated by the linear fees. Instead of services receiving increases and decreases with enrollment, they will have set expenditure levels.

"By setting the expenditure authority, excesses are funneled into a reserve," Brad Finkeldei, student body vice president, said.

To determine the conversions from the flat-rate-privilege-fee system, Schellhardt took the current fee total, $216.45, and calculated the percentage each campus service receives from student fees and the total amount of generated revenue.

Senate was told to go ahead and make regulations for implementation for linear fees and the

FITZWATER TO VISIT K-STATE, DISCUSS NEW BOOK, SPEAK TO ALUMNI

Former White House press secretary Marlin Fitzwater will visit K-State Nov. 3.

Fitzwater served presidents Ronald Reagan and George Bush.

He will be at K-State to discuss his new book, "Call the Briefing."

In the book, Fitzwater writes about his career and his school days at K-State.

Fitzwater graduated from K-State in 1965 with a bachelor's degree in journalism.

His news conference is at 1 p.m. in the K-State Student Union director's conference room.

The conference will not be open to students because of space constraints, Cheryl May, director of K-State News Services, said.

However, Fitzwater will speak to the KSU Foundation Board of Trustees at its annual meeting.

More than 250 K-State alumni and friends are expected to hear Fitzwater speak about his experiences at K-State and in Washington.

He will also discuss a scholarship he established for graduates of Abilene High School where he attended.

Kirk Baughan, of KSU Foundation, said Fitzwater is a firm believer in providing educational opportunities to children. "He's one of the most notable alumni of K-State," said Baughan.

Fitzwater will be signing copies of the book at Varney's bookstore from 2 to 4 p.m. Nov. 3.

SIGNAL HAD HISTORY OF ERROR

FOX RIVER GROVE, Ill. (AP) — Moments before a commuter train slammed into a school bus stopped at a traffic light, killing seven students, the police chief and an engineer arrived at the crossing to inspect the balky signal, authorities said Thursday.

The light is supposed to automatically turn green and clear the tracks as trains approach, but the timing doesn't seem right, National Transportation Safety Board member John Goglia said.

Investigators are trying to determine why the bus carrying 35 students remained in the path of the train Wednesday. They began testing the light overnight and were seeking police phone logs to check for complaints about the signal.

Residents said they've been complaining for a long time about poor coordination between the gates and signals at the crossing and the stoplight at the intersection just beyond.

"People have been saying something's going to happen because it's just not timed right," said Jim Homola, who was in his car behind the bus when the train hit.

Truck driver Charlie Ward said he was caught in a dangerous squeeze at the same intersection only a half hour earlier.

"You do not get a green light to clear the intersection before the railroad signals and gate come down," Ward said. "You got to wait until something big happens to get these ding-dongs out here to get something done."

WINFIELD REELS FROM CLOSING

WINFIELD (AP) — Many community officials and Winfield state hospital supporters were reduced to angry and bitter mutterings after a state commission reversed itself and marked their institution for closure Thursday.

The Hospital Closure Commission originally condemned the Kansas Neurological Institute in Topeka.

But some members were bothered because the commission also wanted to close another Topeka institution, but they reconsidered.

The Winfield hospital has the equivalent of almost 850 full-time employees and is perhaps the most important employer in the south-central Kansas community.

RILEY

This is the second year for joint training exercises for U.S. and Russian troops. Peacekeeper '94 was conducted in Russia.

Both Maj. Gen. Randolph House of Fort Riley and Russian Gen.-Lt. Aleksandr Sokolov said the mission was important to the continued peace and cooperation between the United States and Russia.

"Through these exercises, we hope to foster mutual trust and understanding between our forces and nations," House said.

He said he hoped the troops would learn from each other.

"I hope the Russian troops leave here with the best part of America having created genuine friendships," he said.

Sokolov said he and his troops were pleased to finally get an opportunity to see America first-hand.

He said he and the troops had only been able to learn about American from papers.

"You can't just read papers, you can only judge by spirit," he said.

Russian Col. Nicholas Malyshev said he was most surprised by the private property in the United States.

"There is so much land that is private property," he said. "You go a little off the highway and you breach private property. It is not like that in Russia."

Malyshev said he was surprised how much the two groups of people looked alike.

"We never hated the American people," he said.

"We see them with our own eyes, and we see that they are friendly. We don't hate them. It was politics."

Vadim Stepanishin, a 22-year-old language specialist for the Russian Army, smoked a cigarette and talked casually with American soldiers.

Stepanishin said his country has changed much in the last two years. He said the Russian people were enjoying more freedom, but they were shocked by high inflation.

"Things are moving forward," he said. "In 10-15 years, I envision Russia will be in a better place."

Spc. Andrew Fox, a 22-year old soldier from Florida, said he felt it was a little strange training with Russian troops after so many years of being enemies.

However, he said he thought the troops had a lot to learn from each other.

"Soldiers are soldiers," he said. "They are all just people."

The troops will be simulating a combined U.N. peacekeeping effort. The troops will set up and maintain a simulated buffer zones between warring forces and practice escorting convoys and delivering humanitarian aid.

The exercises will cost an estimated $1.3 million, all of which will be paid by the United States.

"It is not much money for peace," House said.

Senate approves final privilege fee

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

Student Senate reviewed the last privilege fee Thursday night.

The $1 Bramlage Coliseum maintenance fee was approved for another two years.

Privilege fees will be eliminated under the linear-fee system. All the other services that receive line-item fees will have budgets reviewed instead of a fee amount.

A bill defining student-at-large members was sent back to the Senate Operations Committee. The resolution did not address whether College Councils or other campus-elected positions outside the legislative, executive and judicial branches could be considered for at-large positions.

In allocations business, an allocation bill for the Society for Appreciation of Bharatiya Heritage and Arts was sent back to the Allocations Committee.

Some senators said they thought the allocation for the classical music concert should come from the fine arts fee instead of the student activity fee.

"I don't like to do this, but I still have some questions about this allocation," Bill Muir, faculty representative, said. "This body funded zero dollars last year because the committee thought it was best left to the Fine Arts Council."

The Black Pan-Hellenic Council

allocation for $713 was withdrawn because the funds were no longer needed.

A special allocation for purchasing two Macintosh computers for the Office of Student Activities and Services was killed. The author, Chris Avila, graduate senator, took his name off the bill.

In other business, Drew Wallace, business senator, moved to change next week's meeting from Thursday to Tuesday night because of Homecoming.

"I think it's ridiculous to have a meeting when most of us are not going to be able to be here," Wallace said.

Twenty-eight members of Senate are greek, Phil Anderson, faculty representative, said.

John Potter, Senate chairman, said he had not moved the meeting because all senators knew there would be meetings every Thursday at 7 p.m.

Potter asked senators which constituents they would be best representing if they chose to attend the Homecoming events instead of the Senate meeting.

Brian Wysocki, human ecology senator, proposed an amendment to cancel the Senate meeting next week.

On a vote of 26 - 27, the amendment failed. Senate began debating the date of next week's meeting at 10 p.m. and was still debating the issue at 11 p.m.

Players involved in incident tarnish reputation

Like it or not, football players are K-State representatives. And like it or not, playing football is a privilege — not a right.

It doesn't matter whether you are a fan of K-State football. What matters is that students attending this University should be outraged.

On Tuesday, three football players were charged with counts of battery, criminal damage to property, criminal trespass, conspiracy to commit battery and cruelty to animals, stemming from an incident that happened Aug. 20.

Tomorrow, those three players will be representing the University on the football field, and that is wrong.

Those players should be suspended from the team for at least one game.

Coach Snyder said, via press release, "The disciplinary measures were handled at the time of the incident and are still being administered where appropriate."

That statement, at least, implies Snyder believed the players were involved in the incident and were punished.

Make no mistake. The legal system says innocent until proven guilty, and we are not saying the players are guilty. What we are saying is they are bad ambassadors for this University.

If Student Body President Jeff Peterson or other campus ambassadors were charged with similar crimes, they would be asked to step aside, resign or not represent the University until the matter is settled.

But, it seems, football players are immune to that sort of treatment.

Like it or not, football players are K-State representatives. And like it or not, playing football is a privilege — not a right.

These players have tarnished the reputation of this University, and as a result, they should not be representing this University on the playing field.

Carrying on the tradition,

Cats aim for hawks

It's that time of the year again when the days get shorter, the weather gets nippier, and people get grumpier.

We're nine weeks into the semester without a day off, and I think that is making everyone a little nasty all the way around.

It is especially bad in the newsroom. Ever seen feeding time at the zoo? If you have, you've seen this madhouse when deadline rolls around. I've seen prison uprisings that were tamer and went more smoothly.

And it only gets worse as the year goes on — talk about vicious and cutthroat.

At the beginning of the semester, the weaklings are quickly weeded from the herd. It's usually a fairly loud and drawn-out process. Blood and bones are everywhere.

But as the semester tramps on, people just begin disappearing. There's no warning, no hint about what is going to happen. One day someone is there, and the next day we aren't allowed to mention their name, but for some reason, there is a new smell coming from underneath the editor's office floor.

He smacks the gazpacho he had for lunch, but we're smart. We've seen X-Files. We know the truth.

The Collegian is not the only place where it seems as if everyone has grown fangs and claws. Rumor has it the students in the architecture department have been cramped up in Seaton Hall so long they are resorting to cannibalism. I don't know if it's true, but I'm not walking through there to find out.

There is, however, one good thing about this time of the year that makes the torture of the daily grind a little less on the excruciating side.

It is the Sunflower Showdown.

Yes! It is that time of year again. At last, the weekend we've all been waiting for, when everyone from Tuttle Creek to the Lawrence River is tense anticipating the fight of the year.

For those plebes out there who have no clue what I am talking about, read carefully and remember.

This Saturday the K-State Wildcats are going head-to-head with their worst enemy. It ain't Colorado or Oklahoma State. I'd say its name, but it wouldn't be right. My mother taught me not to say bad words.

But I will say it begins with a K and ends with a U. I'll let your imagination come up with the unspeakable horror lies between those two letters.

In other words, the Wildcats are going to a turkey hunt, and I have no doubt they'll end up with more than a mouthful of pin feathers.

There are some people who think this is just a football game. Ha. What innocent and disillusioned fools they are. This is not merely a game. This is an annual event that defines autumn just as much as presidential elections, Thanksgiving and stress.

This is a tradition. This is a ritual that spans whatever racial, economic or religious boundaries we may have the rest of the year and binds us all in a common hatred.

This is the one time when there are no farmers against gangsters and no greeks against geeks. We are all K-Staters. It's us against them, and the theme is far more hideous than any one of the us ever was.

I know everyone of us wishes we could be the one carrying our school colors and a hundred pounds of uniform out there on Wagner Field. But we can't. We have to be content with sending the biggest, smartest and bravest of us to take them on.

But we are behind them all the way in spirit. Oh, yes. When those players step out on Wagner Field, they're carrying more than the ball. They are carrying the hopes, dreams and pent-up frustrations of a long-tried and perpetually-tired student body.

Wherever they are, Wildcat fans from all over the world will face the east Saturday and send silent cheers and good wishes toward Wagner Field so we may kick butt for the third year in a row.

Of course, on the off chance K-Spew finds the cojones on the field to upset our chance for a third win in a row, there is always basketball season.

COLLEGIAN MISQUOTES

Editor,

I'm writing this letter in regards to yesterday's misquote about the football players.

It's amazing how a small group of words can be transformed into such a damaging phrase such as, "I want them to hang."

First and foremost, I want it to be known that is not what I said. I'm as big of a K-State football fan as anyone.

The journalist who wrote this column has taken it upon herself to interpret what she believes the quotations should say, and we all know this isn't the first time someone has been misquoted by the Collegian.

When she asked me if I thought the football players should be kicked off the team or suspended for the KU game, I said no, it wasn't a football matter and it has nothing to do with Coach Bill Snyder.

I said, "Let the law take care of it."

The fact is, I don't really give a damn what happens. None of this has a bearing on me either way. I know Nyle Wren and the other guys involved, but that doesn't make it my business or anyone else's.

It was a personal incident that should be taken of by a court, not the Collegian, Snyder or the students.

I sincerely believe this whole issue has been blown out of proportion. The Collegian is asking students what they think should happen to the players when a court hasn't even ruled them guilty.

If they are found guilty and the students finally know the facts, then the students can be asked what they think. But until then, let this issue lie.

Christ provides answers

Nestled just inside the front range of the Colorado Rockies, near Mt. Rosa, there is a rock that overlooks the western front.

The rock is called Inspiration Point One, and I climbed up to it every day during summer 1994 to meet with the most powerful man alive.

I carried my books and study materials to the rock, and he would watch me closely as I perused his writings. He listened to me complain, sigh, cry and laugh. This man had more compassion, love and patience than anyone I have ever met. He is also stronger and wiser than anyone I've ever met.

And he always knows right from wrong.

This man held me steady when I was trembling, but he also punished me if I had done wrong.

This man, who is now my best friend, is more real than this earth that we stand on. My deep, close relationship with Christ Jesus, my Lord, is a friendship everyone should have. Hundreds of other students at K-State also have Christ as their best friend, and they will understand my joy in the relationship. But others only laugh, sigh or mock this relationship.

My close relationship with Christ often causes a rift in my other friendships. For example, last week I found several of my closest friends calling me closed-minded and insensitive. We were discussing project Safe Zone, which is supported by the Bisexual, Lesbian and Gay Society.

Safe Zone essentially allows faculty to place an inverted pink triangle, with a superimposed Willie the Wildcat, on their doors. The sign is a symbol of someone who will be open and understanding and who will help homosexuals without being heterosexual.

My friends all loved the idea. They said it was about time homosexuals could find approving, condoning support. However, I disagree.

In fact, the idea of helping homosexuals continue a homosexual lifestyle hurts me deep within my heart. I do not hate homosexuals, or judge them like Fred Phelps. My bisexual friend, Kevyn Jacobs, is very sweet, loving and kind. I could never hate Kevyn.

But I do hate homosexuality. My best friend, Christ, said homosexuals will not inherit the kingdom of God. He is not lying, and that is why homosexuality hurts me. I don't want to see any of these people that are "helped" by project Safe Zone go to hell. And I encourage you, as you read this with doubt creeping into your mind, to investigate the Bible to see if it is the truth. I have looked, investigated and questioned whether Christ actually exists, and I have found it to be true.

I encourage you to do the same. And you will discover as hard as it is to believe and admit, Christ is always right. If

He said homosexuality is wrong and immoral, then He knows what He is talking about. He has watched thousands of generations, just like ours, walk this earth. He knows what hurts us and what helps us.

As harsh as it may seem, Christ will send homosexuals to hell because of the sin, and not because He doesn't love them. And I would never wish anyone to go to hell.

If you are doubting the validity of my statements, I don't blame you. If you are angry or upset with the harshness of my statements, I don't blame you. If you are scared — good.

But please don't sit there and see the anger and idleness. Start talking to Christ, whether you believe in Him or not. Ask Him a few questions and investigate whether this amazing man is alive and knocking at your door.

He can tell you if He exists. And He can tell you if homosexuality is right or wrong.

RULES OF IMPEACHMENT

Editor,

As a response to your editorial of Oct. 25, several items concerning the consideration of impeachment for a student senator need correction or clarification:

1.) The Article V, Section 5. B. of the Student Government Association by-laws states, "Any senator with three (3) unexcused absences shall be subject to impeachment" not "Any student senator who misses three Student Senate meetings during one term of office will automatically be considered for impeachment by Student Senate, unless excused by the chairperson of Student Senate," which you quoted in your editorial.

A rather big difference between "subject to" and "automatically be considered." And I think you are trying to quote V. 5. C., which provides a senator dropping below full-time (or six graduate hours) "will automatically be considered for impeachment."

2.) Your statement that "the only body intended to rule on any evidence is Student Tribunal" is incorrect.

If that were the case, why does Article V, section 9. H. 4. required a hearing of Senate Operations Committee "on the member's possible impeachment" and for them to determine if they're on "confirmed grounds for impeachment"?

And why does it take a two-thirds vote of Student Senate to impeach a student senator?

Does it just forward the case to Tribunal without any consideration of the evidence or whether there is probable guilt or innocence?

I think not.

3.) Certain members of the Senate Operations Committee based their decision on whether retreat was a regularly called meeting of Student Senate.

If it was, then the senator had three unexcused absences.

If it was not, then the senator did not have three absences.

There was nothing out-of-order about the decision.

In fact, it followed the outlined of the by-laws in every way.

4.) The Senate Operations Committee, by majority vote, determined that "confirmed grounds for impeachment" were not present and that a bill of impeachment should not be sponsored.

You state, "the committee needs to stay within its responsibilities for the sake of due process."

I think you will conclude, as I have, that the Senate Operations Committee, as outlined above, fairly and impartially decide how to proceed — given what the by-laws outline for impeachment proceedings.

AGASSI INJURED

ESSEN, Germany (AP) — Andre Agassi re-injured a chest muscle at the Eurocard Open on Thursday, forcing a layoff that could cost him his No. 1 ranking.

Agassi said the injury, which first bothered him at the Davis Cup semifinal against Sweden a month ago, flared up again while he was serving in the first set against fellow American MaliVai Washington. Washington went on to win the match 4-6, 6-1, 6-1.

The Collegian will have a complete analysis of the K-State vs. Kansas game in addition to coverage of Wildcat cross country and volleyball action.

Cats to face diverse Kansas attack

by Ryan O'Halloran
and
Dan Lewerenz
JAYHAWK ATTACK

Co-defensive coordinator Jim Leavitt was asked a simple question Tuesday: What kind of problem does the Kansas offense pose?

In past weeks, the coaching staff would mention one or two players that stood out on the opposition, and that would be the end of it.

But with a unit as talented and balanced as the Jayhawks', Leavitt's answer wasn't simple or short because there's more to the KU offense than quarterback Mark Williams and running backs L. T. Levine and June Henley. "They pose a lot of problems, and I'm being honest," Leavitt said. "Their running backs are extremely good. Their offensive line is very good. Their quarterback is throwing at a 63-percent completion rate. Their wide receivers are good and their tight end is solid."

"They all present problems."

The stats show Kansas' offense is balanced. Running backs Henley and Levine have 604 and 589 yards rushing, respectively. Wide receiver Isaac Byrd has caught 31 passes, Ashaundai Smith has 28 catches and Henley has 20. "They're well-rounded," K-State co-defensive coordinator Bobby Stoops said. "They got a solid running game, and with that, they can spread the field, and they do a good job of throwing the football."

Senior Mark Williams has come into his own, throwing for more yards already than KU quarterbacks did all of last season with the same number of touchdowns at nine. "Mark's an exciting player," Kansas coach Glen Mason said. "He's the type of guy that we have not had here. He really has the ability to take a potentially bad play and turn it into a good play, and at times, he's had the ability to take a good play and make it a bad play."

Williams' main asset is that he doesn't get rattled in tight situations, Mason said. He thrives under pressure, as he did in road wins over Colorado and Oklahoma.

"He makes things happen," Mason said. "We're pleased with the job Mark's doing. He plays with a lot of confidence. He goes out and plays, and he has fun. He doesn't get uptight about things, and he just wants to out there, snap the ball and play. We've kind of taken on that type of personality on offense."

Williams stays out of trouble by leaving the pocket, but not to the extent that he's forced to keep it.

"He does a good job of scrambling and staying alive in the pocket and finding the open receivers," Stoops said. "Even when he is pressured, he's good at avoiding it and keeping himself in an area that he can find a wide receiver instead of losing vision of the field by starting to run."

In its first two games, Kansas labored, beating Cincinnati and North Texas. But in game three against Texas Christian, the Jayhawks hit stride, winning 38-20. In the conference action, Kansas has averaged more than 37 points per game.

Smith, just five-foot-six, 160 pounds, is KU's do-everything player.

"I think, pound for pound, there's not a better football player around," Mason said. "He catches the ball, he blocks his tail off, he runs the ball on the reverse, he covers punts — we get our money's worth out of that guy."

Leavitt has only one sure way of stopping the Jayhawk attack.

"Playing with 12 men might be the way," Leavitt said. "If we can sneak another guy in there..."

WILDCAT DEFENSE

K-State brings the nation's No. 1 defense, allowing only 219 yards per game, into tomorrow's showdown against Kansas.

But the Wildcats can't take anything for granted Saturday. K-State coach Bill Snyder said this Kansas team is unlike any he has seen before.

DARREN WHITLEY/Collegian

Chuck Marlowe tackles a Kansas back during last year's game in Lawrence.

"I think what makes Kansas the quality football team they are now is that they have great balance — offense, defense, kicking game, run, pass — they're balanced in all aspects," Snyder said.

"This appears to be the best KU team I've ever coached against."

In recent years, Kansas has had a solid running game. This year, running backs L. T. Levine and June Henley have both had 100-plus yard games. Levine averages 96.3 yards per game to lead the Jayhawks, with Henley adding another 84 yards per contest.

"You always have to stop the running game, especially with a team the caliber of Kansas," Snyder said.

"We really have to tackle KU's running game. We just can't let those backs get 100 yards each."

Wildcat cornerback Chris Canty agreed, saying the entire Kansas offense contributes to the success of the run.

"They're doing great things right now — the line is blocking, and the receivers are blocking, and they're executing — just everything is going well for them right now," he said.

The success of the run, combined with a new passing quarterback and talented receivers, has made Kansas a solid passing team.

"They've improved with each and every game, and now they're a threat to pass," Canty said.

As a result, the Cats won't be able to just stuff the run like they did last year in Lawrence, K-State co-defensive coordinator Bobby Stoops said.

"You have to defend the run," Stoops said. "And when they do throw the ball, it's equally as important to have good coverage on their passing game."

"We have to shut them down early and late. With them, you've got to be able to stop the run early and throughout the game because they will never totally abandon the run. They've got two quality backs, and we've got to be able to stop them."

Linebacker Percell Gaskins said the difficulty in facing a team like Kansas is their balance.

"It's always a challenge when you have a team with such a balanced attack on offense," Gaskins said.

But Gaskins said that after the drubbing K-State received in Nebraska, the defense is ready to come back for the KU game.

"It's something we have to do," Gaskins said. "And it's something that we are going to do. I wouldn't expect anything less."

For coverage of K-State's offense and KU's defense, see the Collegian's special section.

CORRECTION
In yesterday's Collegian, Chris Brigdon was misquoted as saying, "I want these players to hang." Brigdon actually said the law should take care of it, and if they hang, they hang. The Collegian regrets the error.

CROSS COUNTRY

Wildcats in Lawrence for Big 8 Championships

Ryan O'Halloran
contributing writer

This could be the day for the K-State men's cross country team to get into the rankings with a good performance at the Big 8 Championships in Lawrence.

The women's race starts at 3 p.m. today at Rim Rock Farm, with the men's following at 3:45.

Even though it has performed well throughout the season, K-State has needed a telescope to see the rankings, while other teams such as Kansas, which the coaches picked to finish last today, continue to get votes.

"We've beaten four of the teams on the men's side that have gotten votes," Coach Terry Drake said. "I don't know if it's a case of we haven't been there for the last couple of years, and it's harder to get back in."

"Kansas keeps getting votes, and we beat them pretty good."

On Sept. 9 at the Jayhawk Invitational, the Wildcats finished second, soundly beating Kansas. In the race at Lawrence, the same course that will be run today, John Thorpe finished first, with Ryan Clive-Smith fifth and David Dominguez seventh.

For K-State to finish in the top four today, it will need those kind of efforts from all three. Drake said he expects Clive-Smith, who has been K-State's top finisher the last two races, to run with the leaders.

"He's running really well," Drake said. "He had a great workout last week, and he's going to be in there with the leaders."

Clive-Smith didn't run much during the summer, and Drake said that set him back at the beginning of the season.

"He took a lot of time off this summer so he got here a little bit behind, and he's just gotten better as the year has gone along," Drake said. "He's been there, he's a veteran and he gets up for this meet."

Clive-Smith finished 17th at last year's championships 25th in 1993.

In the coaches poll, No. 2 Colorado was picked to win the conference, followed by No. 4 Oklahoma State, No. 5 Iowa State, K-State, Missouri, Nebraska, Oklahoma and Kansas.

Drake said the men's team is performing up to his expectations, but even if K-State places fourth as a team today, it will be considered a solid outing.

"They're doing about as well as I expected," Drake said. "The trouble is that three of the top five teams in the country are in your conference and if we get fourth, it could be a good meet for us."

Behind top-ranked Colorado, the field is wide open on the women's side, and K-State could finish anywhere from second to fifth. The coaches voted K-State fifth, but the Cats could move up with good races from Irma Betancourt and Charity Swartz.

"Irma's goal is to get into the top five, and I don't think that's unrealistic," Drake said. "The biggest jump that will have to be made is by Charity. As she gets more time behind her, she gets better every week."

Last week, Drake predicted K-State runners placing fifth, 16th, 21st, 22nd and 38th.

"That would be third, but only four points out of second," Drake said. "Basically, we need to have three girls in the Top 20 and one in the Top 10 and if we could get another girl under 30th, we could get second."

The women have more experience in this meet than the men, with Betancourt finishing 16th last season and Charity Swartz finishing 12th. With Kay Mannebach and Emily Diederich out for the season, Drake said the race run by Samantha McNamara will be key. In 1993, McNamara finished 48th, and she placed 33rd last year.

"She needs to run solid, and she will," Drake said. "I projected her 21st, which is a good jump for her, but I think it's well within what she's capable of doing."

While the men's field looks predictable, the women's race is wide open.

"The men's poll is pretty accurate," Drake said. "But the women's is going to be really close between second and fifth — there won't be a lot of points separating those teams."

► Three women and two men on K-State's cross country teams were named to the Phillips 66 Academic All-Big 8 Team.

Sophomores Charity Swartz, Ashlie Kinton and junior Ryan Clive-Smith earned first-team honors. Swartz has a 4.0 grade point average in elementary education, Kinton has a 3.77 GPA in chemical engineering and Clive-Smith, a 1993 academic all-American, has a 3.49 GPA in marketing.

Sophomore Lisa Kaul and junior Aaron Brogan were named to the academic honor roll. Kaul carries a 3.09 GPA in hotel restaurant management, and Brogan has a 3.10 GPA in marketing.

To qualify, a student athlete must be a regular competitor and have posted a minimum 3.0 GPA. A total of 73 athletes were named to the 1995 women's and men's Big 8 academic honor rolls for cross country.

NETTERS TO FACE OKLAHOMA SATURDAY NIGHT

The K-State volleyball team continues Big 8 play tomorrow night when Oklahoma comes to Manhattan.

The Wildcats are 16-6 overall and 3-4 in the Big 8. The Sooners are 15-7 overall and have a 3-3 conference record.

Oklahoma overcame the Cats in four games earlier this season in Norman.

Coach Moore said he hopes the team has improved since then.

"I do think we've had to deal with a lot of different obstacles, including last night, and I hope that helps us," Moore said.

With a 3-4 conference record, the Cats are halfway through the season with only five more matches against conference opponents.

Moore said the team is getting near to meeting its goals.

"We're really close. We just have to make sure we capitalize on our opportunities," he said.

Leading the Cat attack will be senior hitter Jill Dugan, junior middle blocker Kate DeClerk, junior play-set-hitter Toie Young and sophomore setter Devon Rynning.

► MULTICULTURALISM

Student promotes diversity

Camille Wood
staff reporter

Multicultural roots have enabled K-State student Arleen Baiges to explore diversity in her culture, her career and at K-State.

"I'd like to be working in something that involves engineering and being bilingual," Baiges, senior in industrial engineering, said.

Baiges brought the diversity of the Puerto Rican culture to K-State when she transferred from the Universidad de Puerto Rico in Mayaguez.

California-born Baiges was raised in Ponce, Puerto Rico, where she was schooled with a Catholic upbringing.

"I went to a Catholic school with Irish nuns from Boston," Baiges said.

But as a college student at UPR, she decided to transfer to America.

Making friends made her transition from Puerto Rico to Kansas easier, Baiges said.

"There was a Puerto Rican student organization, which we got together to meet new people and socialize," Baiges said.

Baiges later became the PRSO president.

With positions like these, Baiges said she did a lot of networking and shared her culture.

"I began getting newsletters from the KU HALO and thought, 'Why don't we form a HALO here at K-State?'" she said.

In spring 1989, Baiges approached the Mexican-American Council of Students to introduce the idea.

"The following semester we had a HALO," she said. "We had other HALOs at other campuses, so this created a great network in Kansas."

Baiges said HALO organizations exist all over the country, and their existence enables Latin people from all countries to feel comfortable in a niche while they are in school to get their degrees.

"They feel more at ease getting together in a community that is Spanish, which is their mother-tongue," Baiges said. "Creating a camaraderie is like creating their own family."

Baiges is K-State's chair this year for the National Hispanic Heritage month. She is also the director and a dancer of the Puerto Rican Baila, a folkloric dance group formed in 1992.

Dina Bennett, coordinator of multicultural student activities, said this month's Hispanic heritage pride makes a statement that K-State is committed to diversity and cultural differences.

"It's to demonstrate a mutual commitment to tolerance, understanding and friendship among all members of K-State and Manhattan communities," Bennett said.

Baiges said she has always been very active in her communities, and Manhattan is no exception. She was a member of the Society of Hispanic Arleen Baiges, senior in industrial engineering, is a native of California but spent much of her youth in Puerto Rico before attending K-State. As a bilingual student, Baiges has been active in many Hispanic issues on campus, and is the chair of October's Hispanic Heritage month.

Professional Engineers and later became president.

Baiges said manufacturing and layout are her engineering preferences. She said working in the engineering field and living in America has taught her the importance of being bilingual.

And she has worked as a simultaneous interpreter with the International Grain Science Program.

"That opened another door for me," she said. "I saw another aspect with agriculture and engineering."

Baiges said she continues to be active with K-State's Hispanic community because she understands the importance of international communication.

"We're sharing more than our personal experiences, we're sharing our culture with K-Staters," Baiges said.

Fans cheer at Chance

Nicole Kirby
staff reporter

Classy Cats, band members, radio commentators and fans roared for the Wildcats during a pep rally at Chance Thursday night.

The Cat Tracker, a large, purple-painted bus, sat outside Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon while its owner cheered the announcer on.

"That's my vehicle there, and I promise to drive it to a victory," Larry McBee, a local businessman, said.

Many of the fans in attendance were equally as optimistic.

"The outcome tomorrow: K-State's gonna win, and I'm gonna tear down the goal post, and that is all," said Tim Gentle, a former Manhattan resident from Australia.

Gentle came down from Alberta, Canada, where he's going to school, just to see the game against KU.

Many other fans thought this game was important.

"In the 90-plus-year history of this football game, this may be the most important one," Mitch Holthus, voice of the Wildcats and the Kansas City Chiefs, said.

The radio announcers, who were trying to energize the crowd, threw T-shirts out to the fans that rushed toward the stage.

FM 101.5 and KXBZ-FM 104.7, invited three of the fans onstage to spell out K-S-U the way that Willie the Wildcat does, but the man who was supposed to make the U made a K, which caused a roar of laughter from the fans.

Willie himself showed up later to lead the cheer with the correct spelling. After the pep rally, Willie sat down at the bar, but the bartender only laughed.

One fan in particular got very excited and danced in front of the stage and hugged the Classy Cats.

"She's everywhere we go. We don't know her name, but she knows us. She's the best fan," Kelli Sweeney, a Classy Cat and sophomore in kinesiology, said.

One fan made a profit from the excitement by selling "Tastes like chicken" T-shirts and sweatshirts.

"I'm just trying to earn Christmas money," Tamie Redding, a K-State alumna, said.

The fans' predictions for the game's outcome varied, but Sweeney had no reservations.

"No doubt, K-State will definitely win," she said.

Other fans were more cautious.

"If K-State can run the football, they're gonna win. If they can't, they might be in for a tough game," Kevin Ross, senior in accounting, said.

Jason Magnison, sophomore in business, was also reserved.

"I don't know — Kansas has a good football team. They proved it earlier this year by beating the No.

4 team in the nation, but K-State has a good game too, and if they keep playing the way they have been, I think it's going to be pretty close," he said.

One member of the band agreed with Magnison.

"It'll be close, but I think we'll do pretty good. I'm pretty optimistic," Mary Jo Minor, junior in apparel and textile marketing, said.

The anti-KU feelings ran rampant as the announcer led the crowd in Jayhawk-taunting cheers and encouraged the fans to yell so loudly on Saturday that the Jayhawks would not be able to concentrate.

"We want to knock KU back to basketball season," David Wartell, a K-State alumnus, said.

EBOLA

Even though the Reston Ebola strain did not harm humans, extreme safety precautions were taken.

"We thought it better to err on the side of conservatism," Jerry Jaax said.

The couple both worked for the United States Army Medical Research Institute of Infectious Diseases at Fort Detrick, Md., at the time of the Reston outbreak.

"Eighty-five percent of the effort at USAMRIID is to find ways to protect soldiers against biological warfare," Jerry Jaax said. "The other 15 percent of the mission is working for virus containment."

Diseases with no known or effective treatment are classified as BL-4. This was the case with the Reston Ebola outbreak.

Jerry Jaax said when they first got to the Reston facility, they thought there was only one room with 50 monkeys infected.

"The day we got there, we got word that the disease spread and the whole facility was infected," he said.

Scientists and personnel working in the Reston laboratory wore space suits with triple layers of gloves, clear plastic helmets and units to provide the workers with uncontaminated air.

It was believed five humans were exposed to the virus, and four of the workers tested positive with the Ebola Reston virus.

The disease, however, did not surface in any of the humans, Jerry Jaax said.

"It is a very difficult virus to study, because the outbreaks are very sporadic," Nancy said.

Nancy worked with the actual diagnosis and management of the Ebola outbreak in Reston. Jerry headed the team of scientists that went to the monkey facility in Reston to contain virus.

"Safety was No. 1 in the operation," Jerry said.

Jerry Jaax said 60 percent of the people contracting the Ebola Zaire strain died and 90 percent of the people with the Ebola Zaire strain died. The Reston Ebola strain fell in between these two, and the little piece missing is probably the link as to why this disease didn't affect humans, he said.

FEES

allocations from the fee account.

"Before, we have not dealt with the money," said Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement.

With the current review system, privilege fees have been set at a certain level, but the amount of money taken in has not been monitored by Senate.

Services had to absorb enrollment decreases and were allowed to keep money from enrollment increases.

"It will be easier to address the needs of groups between reviews with the reserves account," Bosco said.

The Student Senate Privilege Fee

Committee will be responsible for determining an expenditure authorization or spending limit for each campus service when the privilege fees are reviewed.

Services will submit a total budget and then submit the revenue they expect to get from student fees. Budget calculations by the service and the Privilege Fee Committee will be based on enrollment figures from that year.

Although there are no set guidelines on how the reserves account will work yet, one idea is to allow services to petition for money for unexpected expenditures or projects.

The reserves may also be used to float budgets when enrollment figures decline, Schellhardt said.

REVIEW

Winter songs create unity in Espresso

contributing writer

Folk goddess Cathy Winter transformed the coffee-consuming, bagel-bartering Espresso Royale into a caffeinated sing along Wednesday night. Although Winter acknowledged it is always a challenge competing with the oblivious conversation and general coffee house clamor, her powerful voice and stamina demanded an undeniable spotlight.

"It's hard to focus sometimes with so much background noise," she said, "but there is always a group of people that are really paying attention."

It was hard not to notice the motivating activism that enriched the lyrics in songs like "Filter It Out," a blues song with a sense of humor about the minimal efforts in addressing water pollution.

Her message breeds a consciousness, the preservation of both the shortcomings of the past, as well as the misrepresentation of history and of the present.

Among those heeding Winter's sociopolitical messages was an audience as diverse as her style.

"Everybody can relate in some way or another," Bill Smith, sophomore in psychology, said.

"We need more people like her in Manhattan. It reminds me of the '60s, sitting around a campfire, strumming a guitar."

Winters concluded with "Looking for some long-time friends," a song popular at Girl Scout campfires, as an official American folk song that, like many of her songs, seems like a comforting combination of a bedtime story and a lullaby.

She had doubts in the beginning, but after 22 years of performing, nobody could argue she hasn't found her calling in the folk circuit.

"I knew when I got out of college this is what I wanted to do," she said.

"My mother was a frustrated musician and took it out on us, so I thought I'd rather know I was terrible and nobody liked me as opposed to spending my life never knowing whether or not I could do it."

Winters projects an eclectic tide of calm determination and a patchwork integration of politics that makes it hard to decide whether she was born before her time or after it.

"I was really impressed as a performer that she can create a community among a group of strangers," Victor Force, graduate student in theater, said. "Her music has a sense of unity that validates my own feelings that idealistic people can make a change."

"Wanting good things and wanting the world to be a better place can seem so naive, but when you have a whole coffee house singing, it makes you feel like it can happen," he said.

'Rocky Horror' viewers to get prop bags, abuse, taste of cult-film ritual

contributing writer

"The Rocky Horror Picture Show," the most bizarre phenomenon of modern cult traditions, will be presented by the UPC Kaleidoscope Film Committee at midnight Friday and Saturday in the K-State Student Union ballroom for $1.75.

"It's anti-everything decent and wholesome," said Kevyn Jacobs, master of ceremonies for the event. "The attraction is that it's the ultimate in hedonistic movies. It's a hedonistic high."

"Everyone dumps their inhibitions and social roles," he said. "You get to throw things, shoot people with water guns, scream — the regulars learn the movie inside and out and know all the lines."

Much of its charm is its recognizable roots in 1970s culture.

"The movie is very '70s in its sensibilities about sex and drugs," Jacobs, sophomore in graphic design, said. "It's that whole hedonistic attitude about giving yourself over to pleasure."

Prop bags are provided for 50 cents at the door. They include rice, to be tossed at the wedding scene; toast, to be thrown when one character proposes a toast; two playing cards; and newspaper for a tradition that began in 1977 when during the rain storm scene someone screamed, "Buy an umbrella, you cheap bitch."

"It all has something to do with the whole ritual," said Jason Hamilton, chairman of UPC's Kaleidoscope Films and senior in psychology.

"We allow all sorts of things into the theater," he said. "People bring all sorts of things like water guns, and a lot of people come dressed up. There's usually some kind of costume contest before the show."

Hamilton said this is the fifth year the movie has been featured at the Union.

"It's the biggest money maker of all the feature films," he said. "We can always count on filling the ballroom. We use it to bolster the budget."

There is a universal following of "Rocky Horror" devotees that have made the movie a reoccurring trend, like Hillary Watts, a sophomore in psychology, who has been going to see the movie every year since she went to high school in Colorado.

"When I was in Fort Collins, there was a theater across from CSU. We would bring toast and spray guns, and we would just follow the college boys," she said.

Like Watts, Jacobs has been involved in the tradition long before he has been at K-State.

"The movie is so badly made, and there are so many pauses that it leaves room for the audience to inject their own dialogue," he said. "It allows people to interact with the movie, which is a lot of fun."

Blues festival to bring readings, ensembles

Rebecca Schulz
staff reporter

The second-annual Purple Blues Festival will be at 3 p.m. Sunday in Union Forum Hall.

The concert is sponsored by the music department and is a celebration of the blues. The purpose of it is not only to perform the blues, but to be an educational experience, Dennis Wilson, professor of jazz studies, said.

Readings and recordings of blues artists will be featured between ensembles.

"I have always thought of myself as a knowledgeable, experienced player," Sara Pomerence, sophomore in music education, said. "Now I know I have so much more to learn about music."

"Jazz music is something I've always been afraid of — Where's the beat? Who plays next, What should I play? Sunday will be a very nervous day, but it will be a day of huge musical growth," she said.

The concert will feature KSU Lab-A big band, KSU Jazz Combo, Jazz Quintet, Flute Juice and the K-State Concert Jazz Ensemble.

The concert will provide its audience with classic blues tunes using instruments that usually are not used in jazz arrangements.

There will be a flute ensemble made up of a flute, alto flute, bass flute and a jazz rhythm section, Wilson said.

Mandy McNett, freshman in music education, will add a distinct sound to the combo with her Double B-flat Contra Bass Clarinet.

Pomerence is a member of Flute Juice along with Valerie Henderson, sophomore in music education, and Laura Duncan, sophomore in music education. The ensemble will be playing "What a Wonderful World" made famous by Louis Armstrong and "Qutsie," a song written by Wilson.

"It's something that is helping us learn more about our major," Henderson said. "It makes us think a lot when were in the classroom, and it expresses our feeling and it broadens our horizons."

The concert will also feature the jazz ensemble. The ensemble is made up of the top jazz players within the music department. Last weekend, the ensemble was given an opportunity to play with Clark Terry, Wilson said.

"K-State will never be the top jazz school. I want it to be respected, and it's started," Wilson said.

Terry and his quintet came to K-State without any knowledge of the ensemble but left saying positive things about K-State, Wilson said.

Last year's event spanned over two days, Wilson said. The concert was moved to a Sunday in hopes of attracting more students and parents to the event.

"I'm no longer afraid of jazz," Pomerence said.

"It's a beautiful language that I hope everyone has a chance to be involved with."

Dear Senators Dole and Kassebaum,

With our major aquifer drying up; and Kansas dependent on the downstream water of other states for ALL our needs; do you really think this year is a good year to invalidate the federal Clean Water Act? Maybe Ralph Reed has a good prayer for clean water, but I, for one, would rather trust a law that has worked for the past 25 years. Maybe someone else agrees with me, that earth science trumps political science.

Donation buys laboratory

■ Anonymous gift allows department to build facility

Becky Sheridan
staff reporter

An anonymous $345,000 donation has spurred the Department of Civil Engineering to build a one-of-a-kind research laboratory.

"We started surveying it out last week," said Stuart Swartz, chair of the civil engineering department, said. "And we expect it to be finished by the first of April."

The facility, which includes two labs, will be used to study highway construction techniques and constructed in Manhattan's Industrial Park.

"The Accelerated Testing Lab is used to test highway pavement in controlled situations," he said. "Normally, we go by traffic flow, but here we can apply loads more rapidly and exceed a lifetime estimate in a matter of months."

The Accelerated Testing Lab is unique because it can test wheel loads and the effects of temperature and moisture at the same time, Swartz said.

"No other lab is able to test these at the same time," he said.

"We'll have the capacity of testing temperatures that range from 140 degrees to minus 10 degrees Fahrenheit."

The labs will include slabs of pavement with the foundation underneath it, like normal highways, but heating and cooling coils will be placed in the foundation for testing.

Hani Melhem, assistant professor of civil engineering, said the Accelerated Testing Lab will also be used to test bridge decks, bridge piers and highway bases, as well as some equipment invented at K-State, such as X-Flex.

"X-Flex allows us to transfer wheel loads on concrete with lower stress," Swartz said.

"This is an alternative method that we believe will have lower maintenance costs and longer life of the concrete."

The Falling Weight Deflectometer State Calibration Facility is the second lab and will allow equipment to be brought in to be standardized, Mustagu Hossain, assistant professor of civil engineering, said.

"This part of the facility will provide services, mainly to the Kansas Department of Transportation and the Nebraska Department of Roads, to have their equipment calibrated," Hossain said.

Swartz said KDOT has equipment that tests pavement by recording vibrations and assessing conditions. He said because their equipment has to be calibrated and the nearest facility is in Minnesota, they are interested in using the facility.

"If we eventually open it up to the public, our calibration lab could bring in revenue," Hossain said, "but it will all go to the maintenance of the infrastructure."

There is a possibility other departments will be able to bring their equipment in to be calibrated, but nothing has been decided on yet, Hossain said.

In addition to the private donation, Kansas Technology Enterprises Corporation, Kansas Department of Transportation and Cardwell International Ltd. of El Dorado is also donating funds and equipment to the project, Swartz said.

"We're going to be conducting research, which will be attributed to the University," Melhem said. "Hopefully, we will be able to benefit from it."

ROTC visits base, uses B-1 simulator

Chad Moreland
staff reporter

During the dark, early morning hours, while most K-State students were still sleeping, a group of 25 K-State Air Force ROTC cadets set out at 5:30 to tour McConnell Air Force Base in Wichita Wednesday.

"We use the trip as a motivational tool," Capt. Susan Hill, assistant professor of aerospace studies, said. "It can dispel misconceptions and also gives the cadets a chance to interact."

During the day, the cadets were given an opportunity to try something that is usually off limits to the general public.

The cadets tried their hand at flying a B-1 Bomber simulator.

"I crashed the plane," John Gooch, freshman in mechanical engineering, said. "I tried to land it, and I put the nose in the ground."

One cadet compared the simulator with actually flying a real plane.

"An actual plane is heavier, and there's more depth perception," Ross

McAfee, junior in mechanical engineering, said. "Other than that, everything else was very realistic."

One of the highlights for the cadets was watching an actual police dog demonstration. They were able to watch the dogs run through an obstacle course and work on sniffing out explosives and attacking assailants.

"I was impressed with how obedient the dogs were," Mark Williams, sophomore in chemical engineering, said. "The dog did every single thing it was told."

Cadets also had a tour of the base firefighters recreation rooms and the living quarters at the fire station.

The firefighters also demonstrated how they used the equipment on the trucks.

"We got to walk on top of the trucks and get in the turret," Paul Kuder, junior in business management, said. "It was really pretty interesting."

The cadets day also included a trip through the newly built community center, Emerald City. The center includes a full nautilus and weight room, aerobics rooms, a bowling alley and several eating areas.

"It's the nicest facility like that I've ever been in," Joel Thompson, sophomore in computer engineering, said. "My dad was in the army, so I've seen a lot of different bases."

One of the final events of the day was a tour of a KC-135 fueling plane.

"It was my first time in one," Holly McGuire, freshman in mathematics, said. "It was a lot like I expected, except everything seemed a lot older."

It's a matter of Purple pride

Purple paraphernalia a good investment for merchants

Manhattan is getting ready for the invasion of blue and red with purple balloons, drinks, shirts and lots and lots of food.

Steve Ballard, owner of Ballard's Sporting Goods, said he will have four different K-State vs. KU game shirt designs. He said Ballard's has also made four or five custom shirts for student groups.

"We got a special game-day shirt," he said. "And we have probably four different K-State-KU ones."

Ballard said his shirts are on the theme of the game of the century.

On Saturday, he will have the purple tents out front and purple gear and the K-State vs. KU shirts out front.

"On game days, we open at 8:30," he said. "And we stay open after the game until the last person leaves."

As usual, Ballard's will have a shirt available after the game if the Wildcats win.

"If we win the game, we'll do a special shirt," Ballard said. "We'll come up with some sort of special saying."

Ballard said he expected business to pick up Thursday and Friday because people will be buying purple shirts for the game.

"People tend to wear more purple for KU and K-State," he said.

Wildcat Spirit, a clothing store in Aggieville, will have carved pumpkins in the front window with beat KU slogans. The powercat/beat KU slogan from one of the pumpkins will also be available on a T-shirt.

"On Friday, Bob Pottroff is bringing the Catbacker bus out so people can tour it," Michelle LeFort, manager of Wildcat Spirit, said.

The Catbacker bus will be at Wildcat Spirit after 1 p.m. Friday, and tours will be given.

"It's a chance to get to look at what K-State alumni and Catbackers do in the Catbacker bus," LeFort said.

Wildcat Spirit also has K-State vs. KU shirts and a special shirt for the game.

"We're going to have a clearance sale on select items," LeFort said.

Varney's Book store will be giving away K-State T-shirts to customers who purchase $25 worth of Carousel merchandise before the game, Steve Levin, assistant manager, said.

Varney's will also have the K-State pep band at the store.

"We've had the pep band down here for every game," he said. "It's fun for us."

A shuttle will be leaving for the game beginning at 10 a.m. from Triangle Park across from Varney's, Levin said. There will be no parking along Moro Street all day, and Moro will be blocked off at halftime.

Lucky BrewGrille is also hoping for a visit from the pep band, Bob Leetch, Lucky's owner, said. Lucky's and the other bars in Aggieville are planning to open at 9 a.m. for the game.

"We're going to have a pregame breakfast buffet," Leetch said.

Lucky's will have a bratwurst barbecue following the game as well as dancing inside and on the patio all evening. Different game-day activities will be going on all day, Leetch said.

Scoreboard is having a barbecue in the parking lot behind the bar.

"We are roasting a hog out back," Rhett Butler, Scoreboard owner, said.

Scoreboard is selling smoked hog sandwiches and chips, and drink specials.

"We'll have the game on our eight TVs and two big screens," Butler said.

Scoreboard is also having a free shuttle to the game.

Champions is having frozen purple drink specials and T-shirts with their logo in honor of the game.

Shad Metcalf, Champions manager, said all 11 televisions will be turned on to the game as well.

Game sparks memories

Katie Thomas
staff reporter

The football rivalry between K-State and the University of Kansas has resulted in some interesting memories for K-State students.

A member of the K-State Marching Band remembered a fan tossing an object down from the stands.

Tricia Stamm, senior in early childhood and elementary education, said she was coming off the field after the pre-game ceremonies of the 1993 game when something unexpected fell in front of her.

"Out of nowhere, a live chicken spray-painted red and blue landed at my feet," Stamm said. "It was the weirdest thing."

Speaking of colors, wearing purple in Lawrence has gotten more than one student in a pinch.

When Shari Peterson, senior in animal sciences and industry, and her friends traveled to KU in 1992, they ended up sitting in one of the front rows, she said.

"A whole bunch of us had gone, and we, of course, were all in purple," she said.

After a Wildcat touchdown, the group cheered wildly. This prompted a group of KU men in front of Peterson to pick her up and pass her up the crowd as far as they could, she said.

"I was getting pinched and yelled at because I was obviously not a KU fan," she said.

Two other K-State students got tickets at the last minute to the same 1992 game.

Eric Rapley, senior in accounting, and Mark Schneider, senior in marketing, ended up in KU's student section.

"Fortunately, I wasn't wearing purple," Rapley said.

Sitting in the student section at KSU Stadium can also prove to be a brutal experience, especially for KU students.

Limbird said two of his friends who attend KU came to Manhattan for the 1993 game.

"We all had tickets in the student section," he said.

Everything was fine until someone pointed out that one of his friends was wearing a KU hat and the crowd began to chant "Rock chalk, chicken hawk,"

he said.

At that point, his other friend took off his sweatshirt.

"He decided to wear his t-shirt, which said, 'Piss on purple pride,'" Limbird said.

Limbird said his friend got passed up on top of the crowd and was a little dazed when he finally made it back to his seat.

Also at the 1993 game, KU students somehow found seats in the ICAT section, and there wasn't enough room for everyone in the section, Ashley Broeckelman, senior in elementary education, said.

Students were climbing over the retaining wall to get on the field after the game, and Broeckelman was following to get away from the crowd.

"At the end of the game, the policeman was threatening to arrest me," she said.

Broeckelman told the officer she was either going to jump the gate and get arrested or risk getting trampled when the students rushed the field, she said.

"He let me jump the gate," she said.

Look out KU fans — no alcohol allowed

J. Scot
staff reporter

The football game's sold out, and a record number of fans are expected at KSU Stadium.

Add to that a record number of tailgaters and problems with drinking alcohol while tailgating crops up.

The laws are not changing for University of Kansas fans, but this will be a period of education.

"The policy, the law, will be the same for KU fans," Jim Muller, associate director of Bramlage, said.

Drinking alcohol is not allowed on state property, but the law wasn't enforced on tailgaters until this season. KU fans may not be aware of the law, so K-State police will be educating them this weekend.

Ronnie Grice, director of University police, said.

Bramlage has had good compliance from K-State fans, Muller said, and he hopes KU fans will respect the law as well.

"The message went out clearly, and we are going to continue that message this weekend," he said.

K-State police are going to handle this game the same as the rest — No kegs, and anyone with beer will be asked to dispose of it, Grice said.

"If you got it, we will ask you to dispose of it," he said.

Both the K-State police and Bramlage staff are adding additional workers to help with the fan overload.

K-State police will be assisted by KU police officers to help enforce the law and ensure the public's safety, Grice said.

"This game may be the largest game attendance-wise for K-State. We are anticipating a crowd of at least 44,000," Muller said.

"Last year, we had K-State police officers in Lawrence for the game, and this year, KU officers will be here. We take turns working together."

Bramlage has increased both the number of staff working and the number of facilities.

Charlie Thomas, director of Bramlage, said they are adding additional seating for 3,000 fans in the north end zone.

"We are also using bleachers on the southeast and southwest areas. Also, we may put some in the north side of the stadium, which would accommodate roughly 1,500 fans," Thomas said.

Proud to be K-State alumni

story by Shana Newell hen No. 14 K-State lines up on Wagner Field against No. 6 Kansas Saturday, thousands of Wildcat and Jayhawk fans will be anxiously awaiting the outcome.

Not only will the 43,500 fans crammed into KSU Stadium be watching, but many people will be tuning in via satellite to the contest that could decide the second-place slot in the Big Eight Conference.

K-State alumni clubs from around the country will be joining together to show support for their alma mater.

"There has always been an interest in basketball watch parties. They've done that for years," said John White, director of alumni clubs for the KSU Alumni Association.

"With the success of the football team, we sent out a memo that the game was going to be available by satellite, and there was a tremendous response."

There are 28 K-State alumni clubs throughout the United States, and 23 of those clubs have plans to gather and cheer the Wildcats in their quest for a third-consecutive victory against intrastate rival Kansas.

The excitement surrounding the game extends far beyond Kansas' borders and has grown immensely since last season. According to the Alumni Association, last year's contest between K-State and Nebraska had only eight alumni watch parties.

White, a 1987 graduate of K-State, said the Alumni Association has sent packages of door prizes to each alumni club. The packages contain several K-State items to be given out at the watch parties.

In Texas, the emotion is as intense, but an end to the Big 8 has more meaning in the Lone Star State. With the advent of the Big 12 in 1996, the possibility of K-State and KU showdowns with the Texas schools peaks interest.

"There's more hype this year because it's the last year of the Big 8," said Dawnlee Weber, 1982 graduate and president of the Dallas/Ft. Worth club. "With the Big 12 next year, there's going to be more rivalry down here."

The alumni crowd in the Dallas/Ft. Worth area has grown so large, they have decided to split this year, Weber said.

"This year we're doing something different with one watch party in Ft. Worth and one in Dallas," she said.

Because of a close proximity to many away games, K-State alumni living in Texas have been able to travel to show their purple pride.

"Everyone down here is getting excited. A lot of us traveled to Stillwater to watch the Oklahoma State game, and two years ago a group even traveled to the Copper Bowl," Weber said.

But Texans are not the only ones who organize trips to K-State games in addition to watch parties.

Filza Hassan, 1992 graduate and president of the Detroit-area alumni club, said a lot of members fly back to Manhattan for games.

As far as K-State is concerned, Hassan said there has been a definite change in attitudes in Michigan.

"Before, no one around Detroit except alums knew the difference between K-State and KU," she said. "Now more people know about us, and it makes us really proud to be Wildcats."

Being a 1992 graduate, Hassan was able to witness the dawn of the Snyder era, a time when a winning season was still only a glimmer.

"When Snyder came there were a lot of expectations, hopes and desires. At that time, the only thing we had to do was get better," Hassan said. "It's great that over time, Snyder has built a good program that continues to grow and strengthen."

Everyone has a lot of respect for Snyder and what he's done for the University.

But what about those alumni who were never part of a winning K-State season?

Cory Williams, 1978 graduate and Phoenix-area alumni club president, was a student when Vince Gibson and Ellis Rainsberger directed the gridiron Cats.

"KSU football was named the worst football program in the nation two of the four years I was there," Williams said.

In fact, in those four years K-State managed a mere 10 wins while amassing 34 losses. In that time period, the Jayhawks always emerged victorious from the annual meeting.

For those of us who lived through the bad years, we're just excited to see KSU doing well. Beating KU is usually the game we really, really want to win every year.

Simplicity. It's a necessity when dealing with University of Kansas types. If you don't keep things simple, they simply won't understand.

So in telling you why Kansas doesn't stand a chance Saturday, I'm going to keep it simple.

The number one (you remember, the number of credit hours KU offers for Shopping Mall Sales and Trends) is the first number you should remember. K-State has the No. 1 defense in the nation, limiting opponents to 219.6 yards per game. Even the mighty Nebraska was held to more than 100 yards under its average by the Wildcat defense.

Kansas fans will point out that they do have a consistent offensive attack. Their consistency lies in their mediocrity. Kansas ranks fourth in the Big 8 in both rushing and passing offense.

The only reason they will point out the offense is their less than mediocre defense. Kansas isn't even in the top half of NCAA Division I-A programs in total defense.

Now, I can hear all you Jayhawks (almost as well as I can smell you) whining about K-State's schedule. We played Temple (an up-and-coming Big East team which beat Pittsburgh) and Cincinnati (in Cincinnati, I might add), while Kansas played national powerhouses throughout the season.

The Hawks shut down a plucky Iowa State team with the nation's most diverse offense — run Troy Davis left, run Troy Davis right, run Troy Davis straight. There's no end to the talent the Hawks have overcome. Not to mention Kansas' talent for scheduling teams that have just joined a new division. I'm sure the Eagles down at North Texas are a truly frightening team.

But hey, at least the Hawks didn't have to resort to beating up a brand-spanking new Division I-AA team like Alabama-Birmingham again.

And speaking of beating up, how is that cab driver? Don't they give football players scholarships at Kansas? Or do the players have to resort to a life of crime to pay the bills at the Landfill on the Hill? I seem to remember a certain Jayhawk running back forgetting to pay for some merchandise before leaving a store.

And do they get course credit for that, too?

Next, the number two (you remember, the number of consecutive wins K-State has over Kansas). As in the Jayhawks will soon be the No. 2 football team in Lawrence — I think Haskell could give you guys a run.

That's because all Kansas can do is run. June Henley runs the ball. L. T. Levine runs the ball. Even the damn punter runs the ball. The Hawks are barely a step above Iowa State.

Yes, the Hawks have a better record than K-State. But has Kansas played Nebraska? If anyone on the Jayhawk offense can stop the Nebraska running game, I'll shake his hand.

I'd just better find my watch when I'm done.

Finally, the number three (you remember, the number of times they make you change your underwear in a week at KU). K-State has the No. 3 scoring defense in the nation. The Cats shut out Akron, Northern Illinois and Missouri on consecutive weekends. Can Kansas boast of a single shutout?

The mighty North Texas and Houston — with a combined two wins — both scored on Kansas.

I would count higher, but I'm afraid I might lose some of you in Douglas County (you remember, where the football players sign autographs at the courthouse).

The Cats will reassert their superiority Saturday on the football field. And when the game is over, all you Kansas fans can take your beak-waving, Toucan Sam-looking runt of an imaginary bird back to Lawrence, where he'll be appreciated.

By people who know nothing about football.

The Cat Attack

After giving up 16 quarterback sacks in the last two weeks, pass protection is the focus of K-State heading into Saturday's game against No. 6 Kansas.

"Obviously, it's an issue," Snyder said. "But it's a general issue because they're created in different ways, and not all nine of those were created the same way."

Those nine sacks against Nebraska last Saturday in the Wildcat 49-25 loss stymied the Wildcat offensive attack. Snyder said over-emotion for the game against the defending national champion and No. 2-ranked Nebraska Cornhuskers was to blame, but said emotion shouldn't be done away with altogether.

"The emotion still needs to be there," Snyder said. "What we need to learn from that experience is how to handle the emotion."

Wide receiver Tyson Schwieger said he liked that the team hung tough but said that in the end was overmatched.

"We found that the guys really hung together," Schwieger said. "We battled back a little bit, but they're a great football team."

The primary victim of the Husker sacks was starting quarterback Matt Miller, who was held to 10-for-24 passing on the game.

Snyder said Miller deserved some of the blame.

"He had a bad ballgame — that's the long and short of it," Snyder said.

Snyder said it was also important to note that quarterback sacks happen for more than one reason.

"There's a variety of different things, and all of them don't relate to whether an offensive tackle can block a defensive end," Snyder said.

"There's a lot of things you have to address. It isn't always the pass protection."

Up next for the K-State pass protection is the undefeated, No. 6 Jayhawks.

Snyder said he was by no means surprised by KU's 7-0 start to the season.

"There's nothing in this game that surprises me," Snyder said.

Wide receiver Mitch Running said the Cats are just excited to get back on the field and prove itself again.

"KU's having a great year this year, and we're just excited to get back out there and play another ranked opponent and show people that we're better than they think we are right now," Running said.

Running also said it was important not to place too much weight on this game.

"It's important, but I wouldn't say it's a must-win."

Hawk Defense

K-State quarterback Matt Miller and the receiving corps of Kevin Lockett, Mitch Running and Tyson Schwieger will have to have an exceptional game Saturday afternoon if they expect to better the KU defense.

K-Who?

That's right, K-State fans, the Kansas defense has enough talent to rattle Miller, outrun the receivers and even stop Wildcat running backs Eric Hickson and Mike Lawrence from slipping through the line.

But as the Sunflower Showdown draws nearer, many Cat fans have found themselves asking, "Exactly who are these Jayhawks?"

Kansas defensive coordinator Mike Hankwitz knows.

Hankwitz has been able to develop a defensive scheme much like K-State's. In fact, Kansas cornerback Dorian Brew is tied with K-State cornerback Chris Canty in the conference for most interceptions on the season at four. Both backs have managed one touchdown return.

The Oklahoma Sooners know.

In last weekend's Jayhawk blowout, Brew intercepted Sooners quarterback Eric Moore twice, returning one interception 25 yards for a touchdown and setting up a second touchdown at the Oklahoma 4-yard line.

Brew was named the Big 8 Conference Defensive Player of the Week following his performance in Norman, but Kansas head coach Mason thinks it is unfair to single out players for their performances against Oklahoma.

"I think it's an injustice to single out players in that game. But Dorian Brew had a tremendous game against Colorado where he had to cover some fine receivers," Mason said.

"We gave him the same responsibility in Norman, and he did a remarkable job with two interceptions."

K-State coach Bill Snyder knows.

"We're going to play a defense that is a little different in structure. Their difference is that they're similar to ours in structure. We have great respect for them," Snyder said. "They're playing really well with a lot of confidence, and they're playing hard all the time."

"Any time you have a defense with a good scheme, a lot of confidence and players that are playing hard, it's going to be difficult to pass," he said. Brew will not be the only defensive stalwart Miller will have to break through.

The Jayhawks will be starting defensive tackles Dewey Houston and Kevin Kopp, nose tackle Brett McGraw, linebackers Keith Rodgers, Chris Jones, Jason Thoren, Dick Holt, cornerback Jamie Harris, free safety Maurice Gaddie and short safety Freddie Hammonds.

Thoren is second only to Brew on the Hawker squad in interceptions. His longest interception return went for 24 yards against North Texas.

Rodgers leads the Hawks with six sacks for a loss of 40 yards. He also has the most tackles for loss with 11 for a total of 61 yards lost.

Holt and Gaddie also have interceptions that have been returned for touchdowns against their opponents.

With an impressive 7-0 record, the defensive squad is riding high emotionally, and the head Jayhawk said he would be surprised by a Kansas loss.

"I would be the most shocked guy in the world if we have a Kansas letdown in Manhattan," Mason said.

Go Hawks

Jenni Carlson

University Daily Kansan sports editor

My eyes locked on the green vinyl bus seat in front of me. I could have burned a hole right through it.

The intense heat inside the school bus multiplied the anger that boiled from inside my wool-lined boots up to the red-and-blue knit scarf around my neck. Even though I was only in first grade, the chant from the boy in the K-State sweatshirt across the aisle was one I had heard many times before.

And it still made me mad.

"KU. P-U!"

Growing up in Clay Center, only 40 miles from Manhattan, I spent the first 18 years of my life practically surrounded by K-State alumni, K-State fans and that always-attractive K-State purple.

I'm feeling a little ill thinking about it right now, but I'll forge on.

A majority of my high school classmates chose K-State as the place to further their educations.

I'm sorry, guys, but I was the lucky one. I escaped.

Yeah, after two consecutive bowl trips, you and your K-State friends thought you had this football equation all figured out. Recruit some guys that like to barge into other people's apartments and injure dogs, schedule national powerhouses such as Temple and Akron at home and, shazam, national respect.

Too bad this year there was one Big Red roadblock in the way. By the way, is Matt Miller back on his feet after those hits he took last week?

It would have been even worse, though, had the Wildcats entered the Nebraska game with any record other than 6-0. But the team that some preseason polls selected as the third-best Big 8 Conference team got scares from Cincinnati and Oklahoma State.

Some of you Cat fans are probably saying, "What about dem 'Hawks? They only won by five against Cincinnati. Billy Bob and me done figured it out all by 'erselves."

First of all, Billy Bob, the five points the Jayhawks won by is still more than the two the Cats won by.

Second, can I remind you that few thought the Jayhawks would do much this year? A 6-5 record was a best-case scenario for most predictors.

I know. I was one of them.

The No. 6 — which is higher than No. 14 — Kansas football team has made believers out of almost everyone, with ESPN wins against Texas Christian and Oklahoma and the biggie — a 40-24 drubbing of Colorado in Boulder. The Jayhawks just throttled a national-championship contender.

But if you're not a believer, never fear. Late Saturday afternoon, you will be.

There are three reasons why Kansas will win 28-17: special teams, offense and defense.

The special teams unit is led by all-America candidate Darrin Simmons, who booms kicks for an average of 46.1 yards. That is, when he kicks at all. In the Oklahoma game, Simmons ran a fake punt 45 yards.

Simmons is rarely called on, though, because of a Kansas offense that packs a high-powered one-two punch that rattled Oklahoma's nationally second-ranked defense. Running backs June Henley and L. T. Levine are combining for more than 180 yards a game on the ground while quarterback Mark Williams orchestrates Kansas' air attack.

If Cat fans have the guts to look out from under their seats after the Kansas offense works its magic, they'll see the Kansas defense doing some tricks of its own. The defense has allowed only three rushing touchdowns and comes up with big plays every game.

You know, I wonder if that little boy who taunted me in first grade is still a Wildcat fan. I kind of feel sorry for him if he is.

He'll only be cheering for the second-best football team in the state tomorrow.

"We'll for sure have it on TV here," Metcalf said.

Rusty's Last Chance is renovating the bar for the game, Dustin Britt, assistant manager, said.

Rusty's is putting in televisions and repainting the bleachers with a Wildcat for the game.

"We have a shuttle that will leave every half hour and on the hour for the stadium," Britt said.

Friday, Rusty's will have purple and white balloons inside and outside, he said.

Tyler Olson, owner of 12th Street Pub, said he expected most of the bars to be full Saturday.

"We put an ad in the KU paper," he said. "We'll take their money, too."

Olson said the bar will be decorated and it will have beer troughs.

"We just always run off our game day menu which is a shortened version of our regular menu," Olson said. "We might bring in a couple of purple drinks."

Olson said there was no need for bars to run specials during the game because they would all be full anyway.

In the Bleachers will have special drinks during the game, Eric Crosier, Bleachers manager, said.

"We've got our big beer for $2.25," he said. "I'm going to be running shot specials, too."

Bleachers will be showing the game and will have interactive football called QV-1 during the game.

ALUMNI

The Phoenix alumni will be gathering at a local sports bar to display their Wildcat spirit. While K-State-Colorado match-ups have traditionally received more television attention, the K-State vs. Kansas is still the more important game, Williams said.

"For those of us who lived through all the bad years, we are just excited to see KSU doing well.

Beating KU is usually the game we really, really want to win every year."

However, attire at alumni watch parties isn't purple for everyone.

"We always join KU. It is a lot more fun that way. A number of the KSU alumni have relatives who went to KU — black sheep — or — heaven forbid — married Jayhawks! So, no matter what we do, there are usually some Jayhawks," Williams said.

Just because K-Staters move out of state, there is no reason for them to lose their pride in the University and in the teams that represent the school.

The Phoenix-area club will be unveiling new "Cactus 'Cats" alumni T-shirts at the party, Williams said.

"It is a picture of Willie the Wildcat leaning up against a cactus with the words 'Kansas State University Phoenix Area Alumni over the artwork and 'Cactus 'Cats' under the artwork. The back has the words, 'We may be 1,200 miles away, but we still have that Wildcat Spirit.'"

► PALESTINE

Assassin shoots Jihad leader

Associated Press

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip — Palestinians burned American and Israeli flags Sunday and swore revenge for the assassination of Dr. Fathi Shakaki, the leader of the radical Islamic Jihad and a top architect of terror attacks against Israel.

Students at the Islamic University in Gaza City demanded retaliation against Israel's Mossad intelligence agency, which Israeli media and Palestinian sources said carried out the killing.

"We assure the assassins of the Zionist entity ... that this ugly crime will make every Zionist on the face of the earth a target for our painful strike," said a leaflet Islamic Jihad distributed in the Gaza Strip.

Islamic Jihad and the Maltese police confirmed Sunday that Shakaki was gunned down in Malta on Thursday. A gunman on a motorbike, using a silenced pistol, shot him five times in the head outside a hotel in Valetta, Malta's capital.

The assassination threatened to renew the cycle of violence just as Israel's peace agreement with the Palestinians reaches fruition. But the removal of hard-liner Shakaki also buys time to let the agreement work.

Islamic Jihad, an Iranian-backed organization with an estimated 500-600 activists in Lebanon and Gaza, is a highly centralized group expected to be hard hit by the assassination.

"Every action was under the control of Shakaki, who was the commander, the trainer and also the man who raised money for the organization, mostly

Senate cancels weekly meeting

Lisa Elliott
staff writer

Student Senate voted Thursday to cancel its next meeting because of Homecoming week.

The meeting was canceled because some members of Senate wanted to attend the body building competition for Homecoming Thursday night. The final vote was 29-27.

Both greek and residence hall students participate in the Homecoming activities.

Before Senate voted to cancel the meeting, Drew Wallace, business senator, moved to change the meeting from Thursday night to Tuesday.

Wallace said moving the meeting from Thursday to Tuesday shouldn't have been a problem because the final Tuesday allocations meeting was scheduled for Tuesday.

The allocations meeting was canceled because only four regular allocations remain. They will be voted on Nov. 9 because the Thursday meeting was canceled.

Brian Wysocki, human ecology senator, and several other senators said they could not attend a meeting on Tuesday because they had already made other plans because there

Paraguayan leader visits K-State

Portia Sisco
staff writer

The president of Paraguay visited K-State for the first time Saturday during his trip to the United States.

President Juan Carlos Wasmosy came to the United States to address the United Nations and visit the World Bank and Congress, Charles Reagan, assistant to the president of K-State, said.

Wasmosy was invited to K-State because of a technical cooperative agreement between the University and Paraguay that began in 1992.

The purpose of the agreement is to train professionals in the Ministry of Agriculture, the National Development Bank and the Ministry of Public Health.

"We are happy and thankful for what K-State gives to the students. We are the ones who must establish relations," Wasmosy said.

Reagan said relations with the government of Paraguay are cordial. The cooperative agreement will continue in friendly terms, he said.

Marcial Riquelme, associate professor in social anthropology and social work, came to K-State from Paraguay in 1990 and has been involved in the

"Rock Chalk Chicken hawk — K-Who?"

That pretty much summed up the K-State student section on Saturday as the No. 14 Wildcats clobbered the No. 6 Kansas Jayhawks 41-7 in Manhattan.

Forget the sea of red. On Saturday, there was a sea of purple.

"The crowd is really getting into it," Jennifer Greer, sophomore in elementary education, said.

Greer said he was impressed with the student section and the other fans.

"There's nothing quite like a the atmosphere at a K-State-KU game," Greer said. "The students bring so much to it."

Chanting "overrated" to the Jayhawks was another Wildcat fan favorite during the game. Many Wildcat faithful felt KU didn't deserve to be No. 6.

"KU's overrated — that's all you can say," Aaron Wertenberger, freshman in pre-medicine, said.

Wertenberger came early to see the men's basketball team scrimmage in Bramlage Coliseum. So did his friend Jace Kohlmeier, freshman in engineering, who said he had one thing on his mind.

"We want another shot at Nebraska," Kohlmeier said.

a record number of fans — 44,284 — swarmed ksu stadium, the goalposts came down and k-state won the governor's cup for the third year in a row. president wefald declared the game the biggest win in his tenure as president. "i have been nervous all week," he said.

CARY CONOVER/Collegian

Some fans were more concerned with concentrating on the game at hand.

Dawn Slater, senior in elementary education, has attended every K-State-KU game for the past three years.

"It's a great game, and the atmosphere is just awesome," Slater said. "It's better than in the past because our team is playing better than they have in the past."

The Wildcats have now won the last three meetings, and this game brought the largest margin of victory in those three years. The last time K-State won three games in a row was in 1953, 1954 and 1955.

In 1994, the Cats won 21-13 in Lawrence, and the Wildcat fans tore down the Jayhawk goalpost.

"I hope we leave the goal posts up this year," Jay Cavnar, senior in civil engineering, said.

They didn't. Despite pleas from the announcer, the north goal post came tumbling down.

It wasn't just the students who were happy with the outcome of the game.

"This is our biggest win here at K-State since I have been here and in Bill Snyder's seven years," K-State President Jon Wefald said. "This will give us a tremendous boost."

And, just like the students, Wefald said he was apprehensive about the game.

"I have been nervous all week," he said.

► RESIDENCE HALLS

ARH passes policy to charge students fee for pre-registered events

James Dierking
staff reporter

Students and alumni living outside the residence halls are now required to pay to attend preregistered Association of Residence Halls events.

"The majority of residents felt it was only fair," said Eric Keen, junior in mechanical engineering and president of ARH.

The new policy, which passed 19-7 at the Oct. 5 ARH meeting, requires people without residence hall contracts to pay a $3 fee each year to participate in preregistered events.

participate in preregistered events.

"The distinction we made is for all preregistered events. Only those you enter ahead of time for will you be charged," Keen said.

The new policy was voted for a one-year trial period and is being administered this year.

"It was really done as a trial thing, and it's going to be the honors system for the most part," Keen said. "We're not going to go out of our way to police it."

Residents, who live within K-State Housing and Dining Services, are required to pay $3 each year in their housing contract for ARH social and educational programs.

"That's our primary source of funding," Keen said.

Many residents said it was not right to allow people who do not pay for an event to participate in it.

"We have to pay, and it's not fair to us for them having not to," said Jennifer Keeney, sophomore in parks and resource management and Goodnow Hall ARH representative.

Marlatt Hall, West Hall and Smurthwaite House were the primary halls against the change.

"We feel that ARH activities should be campuswide events. Limiting them deters from creating the unity on campus," said Jill Hayhurst, sophomore in speech pathology and president of Smurthwaite.

Smurthwaite has traditionally teamed with Smith Scholarship House for ARH coed events because of its comparable size, and now each resident of Smith, which is not a part of ARH, must pay the $3 fee.

Trent Schaaf, senior in architectural engineering and Marlatt Hall ARH representative, said the ARH budget has and could handle expenses without the new policy.

"Our budget was large and could cover it, where Smith House was a smaller budget and would suffer a major loss," Schaaf said.

Hayhurst said the fee would probably only bring in about $20 and could damage the relationship between certain halls and ARH.

"It's not going to give them any more money," she said. "It's going to hurt them."

► K-STATE DEFEATS KU IN BLOODMOBILE, REGAINS TRAVELING TROPHY

With the completion of the K-State blood drive Friday, the Wildcats can strike up another win against the University of Kansas.

The American Red Cross Bloodmobile challenged K-State to beat KU's 665 units of blood donated during their blood drive, and K-Staters responded with about 780 units.

"I thought it went great," Nancy Powell, consultant for the American Red Cross, said.

K-State grabbed the Red Cross trophy back from KU's win last year.

Powell said K-State's blood drive was the largest in the state, and the Red Cross wants to set up an awards ceremony to give the trophy back to K-State.

"We had great participation from our volunteers and our donors. I guess everyone wanted to beat KU," Powell said.

The drive wouldn't have been possible without the help of volunteers, she said.

K-State beats KU

JUSTIN STAHLMAN/Collegian

"Our student coordinators were a big help. They worked hard," she said.

Amy Donahy, sophomore in pre-medicine; Lisa Hofer, sophomore in life science; and Sarah Robinson, senior in life science, were the student coordinators. They helped coordinate the advertising strategy.

"We tried to get the word out as best we could," Donahy said. "We went to the greek houses and the residence halls to talk to them about donating and to give them a sign-up sheet."

The coordinators also helped during the blood drive and had the opportunity to donate.

"I donated because I felt like it was a good cause," Hofer said.

"The area that the blood is going to is to is where I'm from. It might help someone I know," she said.

The only problem that affected the drive was the waiting time to donate.

Powell apologized for the staffing problems.

"I'd like to thank everyone for their support and their patience. We're sorry about the wait, and we should have it resolved by next semester," she said.

The next bloodmobile will take place next semester, February 19-23 in Derby Food Center and the K-State Student Union.

► GUN SHOP OWNER ARRESTED FOR SELLING WEAPONS TO CRIMINALS

WASHINGTON (AP) — A weapon recovered near a sniper's ambush at Fort Bragg, N.C., was bought at a Maryland shop that federal and state officials say has provided guns connected with numerous crimes, a government source said Sunday.

A 9 mm Glock pistol found at the scene of the shootings Friday was purchased from the Freestate Arms and Munitions gun shop in Temple Hills, Md., in 1990, said the government source, who spoke on condition of not being further identified.

The name of Army Sgt. William J. Kreutzer, 26, of Clinton, Md., is listed as the purchaser of the gun, said the source. Kreutzer is the suspect in the shootings that killed one and injured 18 at the Army base.

The owner of the gun shop was arrested Sept. 27 after an investigation by Maryland state police and the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms on charges of having an expired firearms license and selling weapons without having conducted background checks.

"Gun traces conducted by ATF agents have found that in the past 18 months, the last recorded point of sale for more than 100 weapons recovered in crimes was the Freestate Arms and Munitions store," said a news release issued Sept. 27 by Maryland Gov. Parris Glendening.

"The crimes include 10 homicides and three assaults, including an assault on a police officer," it said.

The ATF's special agent in charge, Margaret M. Moore, said then that "this is a significant case because Freestate Arms is responsible for supplying firearms to criminals. These weapons have been documented through ATF's tracing program to have been recovered in violent crimes in Washington, D.C., and (adjacent) Prince George's County."

State and federal agents arrested Jay F. Brooking, 39, of Silver Spring, Md., and charged him with 10 counts of violating laws regarding the proper sale or transfer of pistols and revolvers.

The store was closed by Maryland authorities because the owner had not renewed his license.

Authorities said it had been operating without a Maryland Firearms dealers license since July 1.

► U.S. SENATE

Budget evokes controversy

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Senators should avoid the political sniping between the White House and Congress and open bipartisan talks on how to balance the budget, Senate Budget Committee Chairman Pete Domenici said Sunday.

"Pete, I'm willing to deal," responded Sen. Bob Kerrey, D-Neb., who appeared with the New Mexico Republican on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"Don't negotiate with the president at the moment," Kerrey said. "Negotiate with congressional Democrats who have already demonstrated a willingness to vote for the very things you say need to occur."

But the senators also made clear they share the same divisions that have led to President Clinton promising to veto the GOP proposal to balance the budget over seven years by reducing the pace of Medicare and Medicaid spending while affecting a $245 billion tax cut.

Sen. Don Nickles, R-Okla., told NBC that the seven-year timetable for balancing the budget wasn't negotiable, and Domenici suggested the Republicans would give little ground on the tax cut.

"We've worked too hard to get here," Domenici said.

Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., said it was the Republicans who have stalled budget talks by their intransigence, and Kerrey said the GOP budget-balancing plan was not realistic if there is a tax cut.

The House and Senate last week both passed their huge packages of tax and spending cuts and are scheduled to begin talks this week on working out differences.

Clinton says he will veto the bill because of cuts in education and health care, and stressed Saturday that until the Republicans agree to compromise, there is nothing more for them to talk about.

He also vowed in his weekly radio address that he would not give in to Republican "blackmail" to reject any raise in the federal debt limit unless Clinton agrees to their plan.

"If we have serious negotiations going on that look like they are going to lead to a real solution, we might give a temporary debt extension," Nickles said.

"We anxiously await the president coming forth with something real that will get real support," Domenici said.

Kerrey said he wasn't trying to cut the president out by backing Domenici's idea of bipartisan talks but thought working out an acceptable budget proposal was the job of legislators.

"He's given, I think, relatively clear instructions as to what he's willing to support," Kerrey said.

Kerrey said he had calmed down a lot since he sharply criticized Clinton for suggesting that his 1993 tax increase, supported by Kerrey and other Democrats at great political risk, was wrong.

But Kerrey added that when Clinton said he supported greater spending cuts, he didn't, and that the political landscape now might look different if Clinton had backed more spending cuts in 1993.

► MANUFACTURING CENTER

New center to give students experience

Chris Oakley
staff writer

K-State's Advanced Manufacturing Learning Center is helping Kansas companies create new products and students gain practical experience.

Gov. Bill Graves cut the ribbon to K-State's Advanced Manufacturing Learning Center Friday as the center had its grand opening this weekend.

The Manufacturing Learning Center, which has been operating since January, officially opened its doors with an open house and demonstrations Friday and Saturday.

On Friday, Graves, along with various state representatives and local business leaders, gained insight into the center's functions and mission at the open house.

Graves said education and the economic situation of the state are two of his top priorities and the center is important to both.

"The Manufacturing Learning Center will benefit our state in many ways," Graves said.

"Already, this manufacturing center has had a tremendous impact on our state," he said.

The center gives students the opportunity to gain hands-on experience while providing a service to manufacturing companies across the state.

"Students are the driving force," said Farhad Azadivar, Advanced Manufacturing Learning Center director.

"It is a full-service manufacturing plant. It solves companies' problems in parts and products using faculty, experienced staff and students from engineering and other disciplines," Azadivar said.

The center, located at 510 McCall Road, is 22,000 square-feet and contains state-of-the-art machinery and software.

The equipment includes advanced manufacturing equipment, such as a laser cutter, robotic welder, turning center and automated assembly line, said Susan Jagerson, Advanced Manufacturing Learning Center conference manager.

A company comes up with an idea for a new product and then contacts the center, which puts a team together.

The team members will design a product and the design process necessary to manufacture it.

They then go into the factory and manufacture, assemble and test the product.

Then it is delivered to the manufacturer, Azadivar said.

The center provides small- and medium-sized companies with the opportunity to use new methods without sacrificing in-house production time, he said.

The center will benefit the state, as well as students, Azadivar said.

"It benefits the state of Kansas by helping manufacturers in the state come up with new products and processes and become more competitive nationally and internationally," he said.

The center has 25 interns, most of whom are engineering students.

"We hire students as interns. It gives them a good start working with companies. We are hoping that down the road, it will entice companies to hire the students after they have worked on their projects," Jagerson said.

The students gain experience similar to what they will encounter working with companies after graduation.

"Since students get hands-on experience, as soon as they graduate, they can serve manufacturers in the state better than fresh engineers," Azadivar said.

David Patrick, junior in mechanical engineering, has worked as an intern at the center for the past six months.

"It is an extremely well-rounded experience. It provides a bridge between designing a product and actually manufacturing it," Patrick said.

"It gives me a step ahead of competitors when applying for a job. It is a priceless experience," he said.

Dole says Powell could help

Associated Press

CARROLL, Iowa — Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole said Sunday he could benefit if Colin Powell seeks the GOP presidential nomination because conservatives would unite behind him as a single alternative.

"One thing about the Powell candidacy is it would certainly drive the conservatives toward one candidate," the Kansas senator said. "You can't have three or four horses in the race when you've got somebody else jumping in. My view is that would be helpful to me."

Questioned about the effect of a Powell candidacy after a campaign stop, Dole said it would turn the race into a two-person fight.

"If he gets in, it's going to be like it is now in the polls — Powell's ahead of Dole, or Dole's ahead of Powell," said the Kansas Republican. "I assume there would be a lot of focus on the two of us."

Speculation is growing that Powell will seek the Republican nomination, and most polls have shown him with a relatively strong standing.

That has upset conservatives unhappy with Powell's position on issues like abortion and affirmative action.

► STUDENT AID

Senate restores $6 billion in financial aid cuts

Sarah Lunday
campus editor

The U.S. Senate voted unanimously to restore $6 billion in cuts to the federal financial aid program Thursday night.

The cuts would have cut sharply into state university budgets, costing K-State more than $380,000 in student loan charges, said Larry Moeder, director of K-State student financial assistance.

The bill included recommendations from the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee to charge universities and colleges .85 percent on their student loans.

Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan., originally called for a bill that allowed a 2-percent charge on universities and colleges, but the charge was reduced in to .85 percent in committee.

Sue Peterson, assistant to the president in government relations, said the House had no intent to ever pass Kassebaum's bill and does not think it will be considered again.

"Most importantly, the fee, as I understand it, is no longer around," Peterson said.

K-State administrators contacted Kassebaum's office when she proposed the bill and stated their opposition to the bill, Peterson said.

President Jon Wefald said the University would resist the bill and take avenues to deter its adoption in September.

A few alterations in the committee's bill allowed the Senate to drop the charge entirely, Peterson said.

A budget Reconciliation Act allowed university and college direct lending to be capped at 20 percent, and other alterations to the committee's bill that will eliminate the need to charge universities .85 percent for their student loans.

Peterson said she was not sure what the other alterations were but that she was happy the charge was eliminated from the bill.

"The good news is the fee is gone," she said.

in our opinion

Homecoming overshadows more vital priorities

In fact, why don't we just request that absolutely nothing happen this week so there is no news to compete with Homecoming?

Student Senate has taken the initiative on dealing with Homecoming Week conflicts with the regular campus schedule.

The Thursday night Senate meeting, which would have had campus allocations on the agenda, was canceled so that Senate members who are Greek or live in the residence halls could attend body building events for Homecoming.

Perhaps the rest of campus should take particular exceptions to its weekly activities for Homecoming.

We could restrict access to Lafene Health Center to a strictly on-call basis so its doctors could be on call at all the group dance and body building practices.

We could cancel class so studying wouldn't interfere with the late nights of practice and subsequent social activities.

Also, because there are Greeks serving as Collegian editors and Editorial Board members, we could cancel the week's editorials.

Come to think of it, let's just cancel the Collegian.

There will be no decisions made in Student Senate this week to report on. Those campus groups waiting on allocations will be too busy with Homecoming to notice.

In fact, why don't we just request that nothing happen this week so there is no news to compete with Homecoming? (We would, of course, cover Homecoming events.)

These are all possibilities.

But perhaps we should just remind the senators whom they represent and ask if canceling the meeting is the best way to represent them.

And for those who squawk about fines for missing practice, we remind their organizations that the most outstanding living groups urge their members to be involved on campus year-round, rather than when it suits the living groups.

After Christian oppression,

Pagan beliefs make comeback

Some of my best friends are witches.

I've been lied to by Christians for a long time about things like evolution and homosexuality. So a while back, I decided to do some exploring and find out what was behind the hatred I see directed toward witches and pagans.

Lifting the veil of lies and fear, I was quite surprised by what I found.

And this week being Halloween, which I had always heard was a pagan holiday, I decided this was as good a time as any to tackle the subject.

To start with, I found out not all pagans are witches. "Wiccans," as adherents of the faith of witchcraft are called, are a subgroup of the neo-pagan movement. They aren't Satanists, and they aren't evil.

Basically, they are people whose spiritual beliefs are older than Christianity, are not monotheistic or patriarchal, and are Earth-based. And they have been maligned by Christian propagandists for centuries.

Being queer, I can certainly relate to that.

You see, Christian patriarchy is just as threatened by pagans as it is by queers. Paganism, and its modern incarnation, neo-paganism, is often woman-centric.

Consequently, women who have power are labeled as evil and witches, or by their more modern term, bitches.

Even more so, pagans are not monotheistic. They don't accept Jesus as a deity — in fact, pagans are very distrustful of one-true-wayisms.

Pagans are generally uncomfortable with the idea of any one religion having a lock on truth.

So when Christianity started its oppressive patriarchal march across our planet, it brutally repressed all the competing religious and spiritual systems it could.

Pagan holidays and festivals were done away with, often by supplanting them with Christian ones. This is what happened with Samhain ("summers end" in Gaelic), the festival of the dead. It became Halloween — All Hallows Eve, or the evening before the festival of all saints.

And during this superstitious age, those who refused to convert — witches — were burned at the stake.

During the Burning Times, as modern pagans call them, hundreds of thousands of pagans — mostly women — were burned at the stake, for refusing to recant their pagan beliefs.

These were strong, wise women, often healers, who were accused of being in league with the devil because of their attachment to magic and earth-based spirituality. Many were lesbians. And it is believed that a great many of the men burned were homosexuals, pagan men who would not conform.

Indeed, this is believed to be the etymology of the word faggot — it was the word used to describe bundles of twigs used to burn people at the stake. Eventually, it came to refer to the people being burned themselves.

KEVYN JACOBS

So the craft went underground for centuries. Much of the lore was forgotten. But it still lived, shrouded in a mysterious veil of myths and magic.

Today, in our post-Christian world, paganism is beginning to reassert itself, but it has evolved and molded to fit modern needs.

As Christianity has lost its stranglehold on our culture, older spiritual beliefs have started to reassert themselves.

Wiccans are starting to come out of the broom closet, and neo-pagans of all stripes are beginning to look back to the old ways to serve needs that Christianity cannot for them.

Neo-paganism is now one of the fastest-growing spiritual movements in our culture. There are a number of adherents here on the K-State campus.

And even though neo-pagans tend to shun formal structure or organization, I've heard tell that there are a few students who are pushing to form a student pagan group and seek university recognition.

I can't wait to see what kind of sparks fly when they approach the Student Senate for funding.

Next week, I'll go into detail about some of the beliefs modern pagans hold.

► RESPONSIBLE MEDIA?

Editor,

Once again, irresponsible individuals find themselves in trouble, and the media are to blame.

For some reason, the same media that air K-State football games, devote valuable front-page space to K-State football victories and bring in additional dollars for K-State activities are responsible for the actions of a dozen men on the morning of Aug. 20.

Now that three men have been arrested in connection with assault, everybody is blaming the media for blowing everything out of proportion. A quote from Pat Bosco in the Oct. 25 Collegian is typical of the response. "From a dean's perspective, three football players involved in an alleged assault are not different from any other students who are involved in an alleged assault incident."

"Just because they happen to be part of the football team is no reason for a distinction. The media is what makes the distinction between individual students," Bosco said.

I would guess two defensive starters and the backup quarterback (who sees playing time in practically every game) are attending K-State on full scholarships, lifting weights in the state-of-the-art athletic training facility and eating specially-prepared food in their own dining facilities at Derby are distinctly different than most students I encountered at K-State.

So is it the media that make the distinction?

No, it is the thousands of K-State football fans who brave all types of weather to support their team that make the distinction. It is the University and the athletic department that actively recruits these students to build outstanding teams.

Once the distinction is made, the actions of these students reflect on the University as a whole. Some are wonderful ambassadors, speaking to school children about the importance of staying away from drugs and alcohol. Some are exemplary students, making above-average grades while making above-average plays on the field. These athletes receive recognition in the very same media everyone is blaming for "uncovering" assault charges against three of their teammates.

Think about this: If the media would have refrained from reporting the assault charges, K-State football fans would have been equally outraged by the coverage when the story became public. It's time to start putting the blame where it belongs.

► FOOTBALL TERROR

Editor,

In light of all the recent attention Nebraska's football coach Tom Osborne has received for re-instating running back Lawrence Phillips, and Missouri's coach Larry Smith for re-instating player Rahsetnu Jenkins, why hasn't K-State's coach Bill Snyder received equal time in the press for his disciplinary action of three K-State football stars?

Simple — his philosophy was not to have them miss any playing time.

Why didn't Coach Osborne, who has been bitterly criticized for going too lightly on Phillips, just keep Phillips in the lineup for the last five or six weeks? It worked for Coach Snyder.

His players were recruited by their teammates, who were beaten up in a fight, to be strongmen, thugs if you will, to track down the bad guys and exact revenge.

When Percell Gaskins, Nyle Wren, Brian Kavanagh and other didn't find the guys they were looking for, they beat up a couple of other guys instead.

Then, to make sure their presence was known, one of them bashes the head of their victim's pet dog with a brick.

Where are the animal rights groups, and why aren't they protesting Coach Snyder's "light" discipline of his players? What kind of message is he sending to the students of K-State — if you beat up our players, we're gonna hunt you down, and if we don't find you, we'll beat up your friends?

It seems that everyone at K-State should be frightened, for themselves, their friends and their dogs!

Editor,

This is in reply to the column by Sarah Lunday in the Oct. 27 Collegian.

Gee, Sarah, I'm darn glad you've found your answers. However, I seriously doubt the depth of your "questions." I'm sick and tired of some Christians and their hatred for queers, or even worse, their "sympathy" for us poor little hellbound homos.

I've got news for you, Sarah — I'm already in hell, and it's because of people like you. Look, He's your God, they're your rules ... YOU go to hell.

Preparation solves auto repair headaches

As winter approaches, automobiles seem to begin to have problems adjusting to the change of season. Have you ever had a problem getting your vehicle fixed? If so, you are not alone.

The best way to avoid auto repair problems is to be prepared.

First and foremost is finding the right repair shop before you need one. Avoid being rushed into last-minute decisions. You might think about taking your vehicle back home if possible.

Always ask for recommendations from trusted friends and possibly faculty members. Word of mouth is often the best advertising for a good technician.

Be sure the repair shop is capable of performing the repairs needed. If your vehicle has any kind of warranty, make sure the repair shop will honor the warranty.

Look for shops that display various certifications, such as the Automotive Service Excellence seal. Certification indicates that some or all the technicians have met basic standards of knowledge and competence in specific technical areas. Make sure the certifications were recently obtained. Please remember that certification alone is not an absolute guarantee of good or honest work. Always ask if the technician or repair shop has experience working on the same make of vehicle as yours.

Before you authorize any repairs, make sure to get an estimate. Always get and keep a signed written cost estimate for the work to be performed.

Make sure the estimate specifically identifies the condition to be repaired, the parts needed and the anticipated labor charges.

Make sure the estimate states that the repair shop will contact you for approval before performing any work exceeding a specified amount of time or money.

SCOTT SMITH

When you bring your vehicle to a repair shop with a specific problem and additional repairs are recommended, you might want to get a second opinion.

On expensive or complicated repairs, or if you have questions about the suggested repair work, get a second opinion or estimate. Always ask if there is a charge for diagnostic time. Some repair shops will charge for diagnostic if the repairs are performed elsewhere.

After repairs are finished, get a completed repair order describing the work done. This should list each repair, all parts supplied, the cost of each part and labor costs.

Protect your auto repair investments by having the work covered by a warranty or service contract. There is no such thing as a standard warranty on repairs. Make sure you understand what is covered under your warranty, and get it in writing.

Warranties can be subject to limitations, such as time, mileage, deductibles and businesses authorized to perform warranty work or special procedures required to obtain reimbursement.

Resolving a dispute regarding billing, quality of repairs or warranties can be the most troubling consumer problem. Be prepared to take action if something goes wrong. Be sure to keep all written materials you receive such as bills and estimates. Write down your experiences, dates, times, expenses and the names of people you dealt with.

If there is a dispute over a repair or charge, first try to settle the problem with the shop manager or owner. The next step is to seek help from the Kansas Attorney General's Consumer Protection Office (1-800-432-2310) in Topeka or the Consumer and Tenant Affairs Office (532-6541) in the K-State Student Union. These two organizations can try to help you resolve the dispute.

In addition, you might want to file a claim in small claims court, where you do not need a lawyer to represent you.

Don't be scared about auto repairs: Be prepared, get everything in writing, and stand up for your rights.

Adults must nurture children

Jonathan Yeomans
staff reporter

The days when children were to be seen and not heard are over, a K-State professor said Friday at a child abuse conference in Topeka.

James Boyer, professor of curriculum and American ethnic studies, spoke Friday morning at the 19th Annual Governor's Conference for the Prevention of Child Abuse and Neglect.

He said that while dealing with societal problems, adults have to nurture children, provide them with dignity and make sure no other adults harm them.

"We must maintain self esteem, feelings of worth and equal existence in any given situation," Boyer said. "Children are our most precious resource."

"How are we going to provide trauma relief and a stress-free childhood in a time such as this?" he said.

He said society is in a fragile time — fractured, frightened and unfocused.

Boyer offered many solutions to the problems he addressed.

"I'm calling on you to seriously study ethnic groups in Kansas for things we may not understand," he said.

People need more love, tenderness, caring and nonviolence than ever before, he said.

This country is still working across racial, ethnic and cultural lines, he said. For example, when a teacher is of one race, a student is of another.

Boyer encouraged everyone never to say, "I don't see color."

He said people were no longer in denial of difference. Diversity is a part of the world and needs to be recognized, Boyer said.

The majority of the audience at the speech were social workers, teachers and counselors. Boyer called on them to develop their abilities to inspire, not just teach. He said they needed to transform the experiences of children entrusted to their care.

Boyer has not always been a spokesman for children's services. He became involved with child maltreatment after a student of his wrote a paper about it. He said his life changed when he began to look at the treatment of children.

A coworker of Boyer's attended the conference. Preston Williams, social worker for Chase Middle School in Topeka, said Boyer made a good point for people to come to terms with people of different races.

Boyer and Williams worked together at a bi-racial family conference in May 1987 and 1988.

"I didn't know that Dr. Boyer was studying child maltreatment at that time," Williams said. "From what he said today, it all makes sense."

Boyer said that with a skyrocketing divorce rate, 16 million children didn't live with their fathers.

"No matter how hard a woman tries, she cannot model a father's role," he said.

Williams said he agreed with Boyer's focus on adult males becoming reinvolved in their children's lives.

Julianna McCully, Topeka Capital-Journal editor, said society needed to do everything it can to boost self esteem in children, from providing basic needs to psychological needs.

"We're so busy taking care of business, it's easy to overlook needs," McCully said.

With three children under the age of 3 at home, McCully said, Boyer's speech was appropriate.

KIOSK SYSTEM

Students' curiosity piqued by Union computer display

Heather Stephany
staff reporter

After a week of sitting outside the Union Stateroom, the Kiosk information display continues to beckon students for a quick glance.

Students can find campus information on the computer system and use the two side sections to receive a variety of coupons and preview products and information.

"It's got a lot of neat things on it," Angela DeRossi, freshman undecided, said. "You can get coupons, find out concert dates and get information on famous artists."

Luis Rodriguez, sophomore in graphic design, said he likes the music samples people can listen to on the system.

"I listen to a different album every day between class," he said. "It's pretty cool."

The music selections will change periodically, said Wendi Kaplan, promotions manager for the Campus Interactions Company. There are now six national advertisers, and nine more are being added, she said. In addition, five local businesses will advertise on the system.

"It's an exciting product," Kaplan said. "We've had a great response."

Campus Interactions Company is launching the product on campuses around the United States, Kaplan said. By the end of the year, 30 schools will have the Kiosk system up and running.

There were lines in front of each of the three sections of the display early last week, Erin Henderson, a temporary worker for Campus Interactions, said.

"People have used the middle part to find classes and buildings already," Henderson said. "A lot of people are using the academic calendar."

Jane Reyes, freshman in medical technology, liked the campus calendar available on the middle portion of the Kiosk system.

"It's easy to come here and see when enrollment is instead of looking it up in a book," she said.

Reyes also said being able to print out a campus map is helpful.

"If you don't know where a building is at and you want to change your major, you can look on here instead of going to 500 different places," she said.

Natalie Anguiano, junior in animal science, said the campus calendar will be popular with busy students to keep them up to date with campus events.

"If you are busy during the week and have lots of tests, you can get caught up on the campus activities during the week here," she said.

"We're all so busy," Anguiano said. "I think students will use it."

Although functioning, the Kiosk system is not without glitches yet.

"There are still a few technical problems, but we're confident they're going to be resolved soon," said Michael Hatch, computer and electronics coordinator for the Union.

One of the problems is that the local advertisers were not on the system for the grand opening. Jack Connaughton, associate director for the Union, said.

"This is just the tip of the iceberg," he said. "Later down the road, local advertisers will see a way to get on campus. Especially since coupons can be printed."

"Overall, I wish I could say it is 100-percent great," Connaughton said. "But we're getting there."

HALLOWEEN

Sorority sponsors pumpkin-carving day for kids

Heather Stephany
staff reporter

Amid the black and orange streamers, and flashing pumpkin lights, 24 children gathered Sunday afternoon at the Alpha Xi Delta house to carve pumpkins and eat Halloween treats.

"It went wonderfully," said Kristy Ackerman, senior in marketing and philanthropy chairman for the Alpha Xi house. "I had a lot of parents come up and thank me, tell me they had a great time and enjoyed it."

The Alpha Xis bought 30 pumpkins for the neighborhood children and children of K-State students, faculty and staff to carve and take home.

The house also purchased stickers, markers and carving kits for the children to use, said Kristin McDonald, sophomore in kinesiology and assistant philanthropy chairman.

"Britt's Farm gave us all the pumpkins for cost," Ackerman said. "That helped us out a lot."

The Alpha Xi house usually lets children trick-or-treat at the house on Halloween, but because it falls during Homecoming week this year, it decided to try something new, Ackerman said.

"I've had a couple girls comment they like this better than the trick-or-treating," Ackerman said. "We get a better turnout and get to interact more with the children than trick-or-treating."

Monica Mattison, junior in secondary education, said the event allowed the house members to get to know more of the children in the community.

"There is no real way to get to know kids in Manhattan," Mattison said. "This helps us get to know kids in the neighborhood and our teachers' kids."

Members of the Alpha Xi house were at each table helping the kids decorate the jack-o-lanterns.

LaCecia Goodridge, 5, said her favorite part was taking all the gooey stuff out with her hands.

"She wants to stay here and carve all these out," said Angela Vaught, junior in nursing, as she laughed and pointed to the few remaining pumpkins.

"It's fun to watch the kids," she said.

Becky Siders, a custodian at K-State, brought her two children and two of her friend's children over to the event.

"I kept it a big secret," Siders said. "When they found out what they were going to do, they were like, 'Oh, cool!'"

The children usually wait until the last minute before carving pumpkins so they do not rot as quickly, Siders said.

She said she was excited when she heard about the Alpha Xi event because they could carve pumpkins there and prevent making a mess at home.

Nine-year-old Carl, Siders's son, said he has carved pumpkins by himself before and he patterned his jack-o-lantern after a werewolf with bad teeth.

"It's fun and easy," Carl said.

Christopher Blackburn, 5, said he did not agree with Carl about the ease of carving.

"It's not easy because I cut the eyebrows, and it's hard," Blackburn said. "It's the first time I have ever been here, and it's fun."

Ackerman said she thinks the sorority will look at doing this event again in the future.

"I think this is a unique philanthropy, and no one else does it," Ackerman said. "The children can just come here, have fun, carve a pumpkin and take it home."

E-mail from KU fans shows their character

I'm sure many of you noticed the annual exchange of the columns Friday. Jenni Carlson, sports editor of the University Daily Kansan, and I both wrote somewhat informative, somewhat baiting pieces on how our team was going to stomp the other.

I don't know how you K-State fans took to Jenni's column, but I am not the most popular guy in Lawrence right now. Perhaps putting my e-mail address at the bottom was a mistake.

"The best you can hope for is a 7-4 finish," one respondent said. "Enjoy playing in the 'Daisy Bowl' in early December. We'll be heading for a warmer climate on New Year's Day!"

Yes, Kansas will go someplace warm. But so will the Wildcats. In fact, I wouldn't be surprised to see both teams playing the Lone Star State. I see the Cats in Dallas at the Cotton Bowl and the Jayhawks in San Antonio at the Alamo Bowl.

But Shane will talk more about that "tomorrow."

What's with the misspelled word? Read on ... Many respondents made good points.

"The Hawks put up impressive wins on the road against Oklahoma and Colorado," another said. I was consistently chastised for neglecting to mention these wins and playing up the Akron and Northern Illinois games.

OK. So I did leave out one small aspect of the Jayhawk schedule. And maybe Akron and NIU are embarrassingly weak schools that we shouldn't be playing (sorry, Coach Snyder, I had to say it).

But that is the point. I mean, what am I supposed to do? Send the Daily Kansan a column saying "Judging by their schedules, the Hawks have shown themselves to be the better team."

Heck no. Your never going to see me do that. Another misspelling?

Why, yes. It was. An explanation is soon to come ...

Much of the e-mail I received was polite, informed and to the point. I assume the vast majority of the student body at Kansas is like that. They don't like it when their team gets dissed, and they respond intelligently.

But that is the point. I mean, what am I supposed to do? Send the Daily Kansan a column saying "... the Hawks have shown themselves to be the better team."

But I also got e-mail from the other part of the student body — the part my seventh-grade English teacher would have called "the unwashed masses."

"(Perform an act of sexual intimacy) OFF YOU FAT PIECE OF (excrement)," one respondent wrote in all caps like a 4-year old. "I KNOW WHAT YOU LOOK LIKE AND IF I SEE YOU TOMORROW I AM GOING TO KICK YOUR FAT (bottom) ALL OVER THE STADIUM."

I have omitted the expletives in the above quote — this is a family paper. The rest is much the same. I first assumed that the misspelling was a typo, but it was consistent through all three uses of the word. I read on with an open mind.

"KU SPORTS AND EDUCATION IS SO FAR BEYOND KSU IT ISN'T EVEN FUNNY."

I began to fear that the mighty educators at Kansas had changed both spelling and grammar in the English language. That must be why they're so superior.

Especially when I got another e-mail with the same spelling.

"So, with that I bid you farewell and good luck because that is the only thing that can save K-State from a slaughter tomorrow."

More than one respondent told me that "I know you guys think your a tough team," completely oblivious to the rules regarding apostrophes.

Hey, guys — Hooked on Phonics worked for me. And I was truly frightened when I read:

"COLORADO! you forgot to write that to talk about history good bowl game last year with your drunk QB"

If you understand that one, please explain it to me at baxoje@ksu.ksu.edu.

Seriously now, this whole e-mail thing has been fun, but most Jayhawks aren't like that. And although I enjoyed their ridiculous tirades, I'm glad Jenni doesn't have e-mail. I'm afraid there are a few Cat fans who have done the same.

For the record, I am more than proud of the thousands of students and fans who booed the capture of the goalposts. That might be the only thing as tasteless as threatening the opposing sports editor.

Keep Dan's e-mail in box full by responding to baxoje@ksu.ksu.edu.

Perrell Gaskins crushes Kansas quarterback Mark Williams Saturday for a 7-yard sack in the first quarter.

Wildcat offense rolls over KU

Shana Newell
staff writer

Just keep the ball on the ground.

That was Coach Bill Snyder's rule Saturday as the K-State offense racked up 335 yards rushing in a 41-7 win. That same offense attempted to pass only 20 times. With 10 completions, the Wildcats posted a mere 119 passing yards.

During last week's Big 8 press conference, Snyder said the Kansas secondary was going to be tough against the pass.

As it turned out, quarterbacks Matt Miller and Brian Kavanagh did pass poorly, completing only 10 of their 20 attempts. A Kavanagh pass intended for running back Mike Lawrence was intercepted in the second quarter by Kansas free safety Thad Warren.

"I don't think we threw the ball really well," Snyder said.

Snyder said he used the option play to remedy the passing inefficiency.

"That's just part of the game. If you can't throw it, bring it down," Snyder said.

Though the K-State running game has been criticized, Snyder said it had been underestimated. "We're a tight knit group of guys, and we do the type of things we need to do. Nobody knows our program like we do," Snyder said. "We know our entire package, and that's what we're going to do."

For the first time since 1979, two Cat rushers ran for over 100 yards during the same game.

Running back Eric Hickson was the leading rusher with 121 yards in only 15 attempts. Lawrence was only a few steps behind as he ran for 118 yards in 20 attempts. Each found the end zone for a touchdown.

K-State almost had three players rushing for over 100 yards. Had Miller not removed himself for the majority of the second quarter after hitting his head on the turf, he might have achieved the same feat as Hickson and Lawrence. He finished the game with 78 yards.

"He's a feisty little guy — he's tough. He'll take hits," Snyder said of Miller. "He has leadership capacity and can be demanding. He takes control."

The team knew it had to work hard to pull off a victory over Kansas, co-defensive coordinator Jim Leavitt said.

"When I got here, we won one game in five years," Leavitt said. "One game is never going to do anything to a program. The guys know they have to work hard."

Lawrence credits the offensive line with protecting the run.

"I don't think a lot of people think we can run. We have a pretty good running game because of our linemen," Lawrence said. "The offensive line did a good job today. Dederick Kelly and Brian Goolsby made some key blocks."

Wide receiver Kevin Lockett said the win helped the team prove itself to potential doubters.

"I think it proved to a lot of people that we can bounce back from a tough loss," he said. "The win rejuvenates us. To be able to control the game and win by 34 gives us momentum."

Miller said he was impressed with how well the offensive line held their blocks.

"The offensive line played awesome. They dominated the front line the whole game," he said. "We have a good offense. We haven't always shown that, but we have a capable offense and good players."

Quarterback draws and option plays were essential to the Wildcat victory.

"There were a couple of quarterback draws designed for me, some options if they play the back," Miller said. "The option is a quality play. You read the front and stay with it. We played it well today."

Also essential to the win was the ability of the K-State receivers to get open against Kansas' secondary.

"Our goal was to exploit their secondary. They're good, but they're young. They've been untested all season," Lockett said.

And exploit they did, from the start.

Ten minutes into the first half, Miller connected with Lockett in the end zone for a 14-yard touchdown, giving the Cats a 9-0 lead.

"They were in a man-to-man coverage," Lockett said. "I gave Dorian Brew an outside move, and he fell off me and picked up Tyson. I was wide open."

Miller praised the Kansas secondary but said K-State had receivers that can do their jobs. "They've got a pretty good secondary. We've just got receivers that can get open," he said.

Lawrence summarized the game, saying, "We ran the ball, Matt ran the ball, Matt threw the ball. We mixed it up and kept them off balance."

Mitch Running locks onto a touchdown pass from Brian Kavanagh in the second quarter.

Cats rock Hawks

Todd Stewart
assistant sports editor

Make it three in a row in the Sunflower Showdown.

Behind a season-high 335 rushing yards on 60 attempts, K-State routed No. 6 Kansas 41-7 to keep the Governor's Cup for the third year and send the Jayhawks home with their first loss of the season.

"Especially with it being KU and the Sunflower Showdown, it is great," wide receiver Kevin Lockett said.

The Wildcats started the scoring in the Showdown only 68 seconds into the game.

The Hawks were forced into a punting situation on their first possession of the game after a third-down sack by Wildcat linebacker Perrell Gaskins. Hawk punter Darrin Simmons fumbled the punt snap in the end zone and was jumped upon by the Cat special teams squad for a safety.

The Wildcat offense got its first score early in the first quarter on a 14-yard wide-open crossing pattern pass from quarterback Matt Miller to Lockett.

The Hawks would respond on their ensuing possession with a 61-yard touchdown pass from quarterback Mark Williams to wide receiver Isaac Byrd. But that would be the only Jayhawk score of the afternoon, and the Cats would build the lead for the rest of the game in the 41-7 win.

Tight end Brian Lojka said he knew coming into the game how important a victory over KU would be for the team.

"I personally thought this was the game that was going to make or break our year," Lojka said.

Running backs Eric Hickson and Mike Lawrence led the rushing attack with 121 yards and 118 yards, respectively. Miller also added 78 yards to the ground assault but said all credit belonged to the offensive line.

"They should all get a game ball," Miller said. "They did an excellent job."

Lojka said the game plan for the KU game was not any different than what the team had been doing all season.

"We played hard, got a good push, but it was real vanilla, real bland," Lojka said.

Offensive tackle Scott Heun said the team never questioned itself, even after a 49-25 loss the previous week to Nebraska.

"It felt good from the beginning," Heun said. "We never doubted ourselves."

The success of the Cats on the ground opened up the passing attack, which accounted for three scores on the game, two from Miller to Lockett.

Lockett's second touchdown came on a fourth-and-two play from the Hawk 20-yard line, when Miller lobbed a pass toward the corner of the end zone for Lockett, who was in man-to-man coverage.

Was it a risky pass on fourth down and short?

"I'll take my chances with Kevin in the end zone over a defensive back anytime," Miller said.

With the offense getting the ball in the end zone, the rest was left up to the defense, and the defense shined.

The potent Jayhawk rushing attack was held to 19 yards rushing in the game, and the Cat defensive front put pressure on the quarterback all afternoon, tallying eight sacks on the afternoon.

K-State won the total yardage battle 454-155. Safety Chuck Marlowe said defensive play was key.

"Our front seven was tremendous," Marlowe said. "They just swarmed to the ball."

Marlowe said the defense knew it had to get pressure on the quarterback.

"We knew once we got up in their face, it would be a different story," Marlowe said.

Gaskins said the record crowd of 44,284 at KSU Stadium helped the Cats to its 41-7 win.

"The crowd was real into it, and we just got after it," Gaskins said. "We didn't know if we could blow them out, but we did, and it's history."

REVIEW

Jazz festival highlights KSU talent

Becky Schulz
staff reporter

The K-State Music Department presented a festival of blues Sunday. And the blues were so deep they were purple.

The second-annual jazz concert at Union Forum Hall featured a variety of musical styles and surprises for its audience. The mood for the evening was set by the classic blues recordings that greeted people as they entered the auditorium.

Lab Band-A opened the concert with "Three for Twelve," composed by Mike Carubia. The song featured soloist Robert Roman on piano and a reading on the history of blues by Freeman Davis, professor of music.

"Just listen to it. This is no sit-down music. The blues is American, our history and our fate," Davis said.

The lab band's set contained a variety of bass and drum players. It closed its set with "Newton High Groove," written especially for the lab band by Dennis Wilson, assistant professor of music.

The song featured three of the band's players, including an alto sax solo by Ryane Keithley freshman in music, which received an enthusiastic response from the audience.

The concert shifted in moods when it featured four smaller ensembles. Jazz Combo-1 played "Black Orchids" and a tune by Duke Ellington.

The piece was followed by a solo by Mandy McNett, freshman in music education, on a contra B-flat bass clarinet that looked a lot like a piece of plumbing. The deep lull of the contra clarinet produces sounds as low as the lowest C on a piano.

McNett was accompanied by Roman and Wilson playing "Am I Blue?"

"It was very smooth. I never heard an instrument like that before," said Heather Emig, clarinet player and freshman in arts and sciences undecided.

The concert then shifted gears from the extreme low tones of the contra clarinet to the high tones of Flute Juice.

The soft tones of the flutes shaped the familiar tune of "What a Wonderful World," made famous by Louis Armstrong, and the impressive "Qutsie" by Wilson.

The quintet was introduced by Wilson, he said he liked this group because he could set it off on its own. The quintet choose the songs it was going to play that evening only half an hour before the performance opened.

The well-polished sounds of the quintet drew ripples of applause from the audience throughout the set. The quintet flowed in and out of solos and into group jams.

The concert ended with the big-band sounds of the Contemporary Jazz Ensemble. The band opened with "On The Road to Kansas State." Wilson said this was CJE's trademark song, written by Frank Foster, front man of the Count Basie Band.

CJE consists of the top musician within the music department. Greg Odom said the ensemble is a strong, tightly knit group that plays well together.

"Phenomenal players that are really dedicated, because they put a lot of time into their playing and rehearsal," Greg Odom, senior in music education. "CJE is a strong example of a dedication to jazz at K-State."

'Virgin alert'

'Rocky Horror' brings cult fans out for midnight showing

Page Getz
contributing writer

Condom wrappers, torn bits of newspapers, remnants of toast and enough rice to feed an army — or a football team — it could only be the aftermath of the cult classic "The Rocky Horror Picture Show."

After 20 years, "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" remains the unchallenged epitome of celebrated social anarchy, unadulterated exhibitionism and general pride in being a freak.

Few escaped the ritual of the "virgin auction." About 30 people experiencing their first exposure to the custom were branded with a lipstick "V" on their hands at the door.

Master of ceremonies Kevyn

Jacobs, dressed in a turquoise flowered sun dress, auctioned off both the timid and the composed for offers including O. J. Simpson's gloves, a KU Jayhawk carcass, a Menudo tape, Fred Phelps' head on a plate, used tampons, directions to the K-State sheep pen and a urinalysis sample.

One bidder offered his "ass" for one of the virgins and proceeded to give a free sample by displaying it to an enthusiastic crowd.

Following the auction was the costume contest, in which the winner, Greg Doring, freshman in arts and science undecided, stripped down to women's lingerie.

Doring began his initiation into the tradition at the Fine Arts Theater in Kansas City, where he said virgins had to "drop their drawers and disco to 'Like a Virgin.'"

His accomplice, Russ Ringer, a Kansas City resident, drove up just to see the movie again.

"Kansas City doesn't do it anymore," Ringer said. "It wasn't selling, and it was a pain in the ass for the theater to have to clean up after, so I came here. It's the only place to see it."

"They didn't have props at the Fine Arts center, so this is kind of new to me," he said.

The low budget and cheap eccentricities of the script serve only as the backbone of inspiration for the audience, whose dedicated disciples are what originally made an otherwise box-office flop into a classic American tradition of rebellion and basic disregard for social grace.

For most of the 400 people Friday and 200 Saturday night who gathered at the Union ballroom, the attraction was not the movie, which could be rented on video any day of the week, but rather the audience participation.

"It wasn't the movie that was entertaining so much as the audience was," said Matt Thomas, sophomore in architecture and novice to the Rocky Horror experience.

"The best parts were when the audience was most involved, like the rice scene, because it was the first time people threw anything, and there was such an explosion of rice everywhere," he said.

In addition to the props, the interjections of various audience-created distortions in the script completely overpowered the actual dialogue at times.

An example: The movie has one scene in which Tim Curry's character, dressed in drag, proclaimed that he had found the answer to the question of life, and the audience yelled, "Who gives the best blow jobs on Star Trek?"

According to most of the crew involved, most of the chaos was typical, and, if anything, restrained compared to past shows.

"In Topeka, we got a virgin to strip down to her bra and dance around the stage," Angela Jellison, junior in psychology, said. "It's pretty tame here."

Mike Bishop, junior in computer science who was searching people at the door, said he agreed.

"Once, Kevyn Jacobs just wore his trench coat and skivvies, and he showed the audience," he said.

"It's like my brother would say: It's like 'Mystery Science Theater 3000' on acid," Bishop said. "A whole bunch of acid."

► REC COMPLEX

New track completed; construction nears end

Katie Thomas
staff reporter

The new one-eighth-mile track at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex is finished and ready for use.

"It's better than the old one because you don't have to go around as many times," Kimble Hruby, junior in horticulture, said.

The new track is elevated and has four lanes, two for walkers and two for runners.

The track is made of a 14-millimeter thick cushion pad under poured-in-place polyurethane to make a resilient and comfortable exercising surface, Raydon Robel, director of Recreational Services, said.

"I like it because it's squishy. It's a lot easier on your feet and knees," Stephanie Nelson, junior in anthropology, said.

There are rest areas within the track's circle that contain cardiovascular machines for Rec Complex users.

The completion of the track brings a beginning to the end of construction at the Rec Complex, Robel said.

"We're getting toward the bottom side now," he said.

Surfacing is still being done on the lower handball courts and small gym. In addition, there are some minor projects, such as the installation of bulletin boards and cable, that need to be completed, Robel said.

"Everything should be wound up by the end of the semester if all goes well," he said.

Throughout the remodeling process, users have been understanding and patient with the fact that they have been bounced around, Robel said.

"We appreciate their understanding," he said.

The remodeling of the Rec Complex has made it a lot better because it is bigger and roomier, Nelson said.

The Rec Complex now has better equipment and more of a variety, Hruby said.

"They did a good job remodeling. I'm impressed," she said.

Students march for day care

Jennifer Taylor
staff reporter

Persistence is keeping a group of social work students going.

What began as a class project to start a day care at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex has almost become a community-wide project.

The entire community can participate Nov. 1 during a march the group is organizing. The group will meet at the Union free-speech zone at 1:45 p.m. and depart at 2 p.m.

They will march through campus to the Rec Complex and back.

"This is just another way to show the council how serious we are," Michelle Mace, senior in social work, said.

The group is optimistic about the prospective turnout for the march, she said.

Raydon Robel, director of the Rec Complex, said the march is not necessary.

"This is just another way they are trying to get support," Robel said.

The group said it hopes to see as many people as possible when they go on their march through campus, Cheryl Martin, senior in social work, said.

"I think the idea of a march is good. People will see them and get interested," Regina Greene, senior in elementary education, said.

Anyone from campus or the community is welcome to join the march, and children will be participating with their parents, Martin said.

"Every day, we get phone calls from people in the community saying you are doing a great job. We have a lot of support," Martin said.

Martin's husband Rick has jumped in to help with the project.

The husband and wife team receive phone calls from community members and interested alumni.

"The support is just beautiful," Martin said.

There are people in opposition, too, but they are not as directly vocal as the supporters, Martin said.

In addition to planning a march, the group is still petitioning. The last count on the petitions a few days ago was 651, Martin said.

JIHAD

in Iran," said Gideon Ezra, a former top official in Israel's Shin Bet security service.

A Palestinian source said Islamic Jihad is split between members who want to reach a compromise with Yasser Arafat's self-rule government and radicals like Shakaki, who reject anything short of a Palestinian state in all of Israel and the occupied territories.

The source, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Shakaki was the only leader who could hold the two sides together.

Alex Fishman, military correspondent for Israel's Yedioth Ahronoth newspaper, said Shakaki's assassination was likely to lead to violence. But in the short-term, he said, Islamic Jihad would fall into chaos.

"The brain is gone," Fishman said. Israeli officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said they hoped the disarray lasted long enough to get them past Palestinian elections, tentatively set for January, and perhaps even the Israeli elections set for November 1996, without a terror attack that could scuttle the peace process.

Islamic Jihad — "jihad" means "holy war" in Arabic — opposes the Israel-PLO peace agreements and has claimed responsibility for attacks that have killed dozens of Israelis in the two years since the first accord was signed.

The attacks included an April suicide bombing that killed seven Israeli soldiers and an American student, and a January attack on a bus stop that killed 21 people and wounded 62.

Islamic Jihad banners in Gaza City on Sunday threatened new attacks.

"We will explode Israeli blood and travel with it to heaven," one said. The group also called for a one-hour strike today throughout the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Arafat, in Amman, Jordan, for an economic conference, refused to comment Sunday on the killing. But ministers in his Palestinian Authority condemned the assassination and urged Islamic Jihad not to retaliate.

"Political violence has always led to the increase of violence and counter-violence," Saeb Erekat, Palestinian minister of local governments, said.

Planning Minister Nabil Shaath said Arafat's government had been on the way to reaching an agreement with Islamic Jihad to end violence on all sides.

Shakaki was born in 1951 at the Shabura refugee camp in the southern Gaza Strip. In the 1970s, he studied medicine in Egypt, where he came under the influence of the teachings of Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman — the blind clergyman convicted of masterminding the World Trade Center bombing — and Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini of Iran. He joined a group of Islamic militants involved in the 1981 assassination of President Anwar Sadat of Egypt.

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, attending the economic conference in Amman, said he didn't know whether Israel was involved in Shakaki's killing.

But he added: "The Islamic Jihad is a murderous organization, and he headed it. He was someone who killed and was proud of it, and whoever deals in murder is taking the risk of being murdered."

Shakaki had a lot of enemies, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin of Israel said.

"I bet he even had Palestinian enemies," Rabin said.

An anonymous caller to the Associated Press in Amman said the elite PLO unit Force 17 assassinated Shakaki because he was disturbing the peace process. The PLO denied involvement in the killing.

Another caller, who claimed to speak for the followers of Martyr Fathi Shakaki, alleged that Libyan leader Col. Moammar Gadhafi ordered the killing. Shakaki was on a trip from Libya to Syria when he was shot.

Mahmoud al Zahar, a leader of Islamic Jihad's sister militant group Hamas, called the killing of Shakaki a dangerous phenomenon.

"Israel will bear the consequences," he warned. "At the same time Israel is demanding an agreement with the Palestinians, it assassinates them."

A leaflet distributed Sunday at Islamic University in Gaza said the new leader of Islamic Jihad was Ramadan Abdullah, 42, a former business administration professor who left Gaza in 1991 and is based in would not be an allocations meeting.

Wysocki proposed an amendment to cancel the Senate meeting, but it failed by a vote of 26-27.

Jason Dechant, arts and sciences senator, was broadcasting "A Purple Affair" when the vote was taken. He had given his proxy to Jason Cole, arts and sciences senator. Cole voted against canceling the meeting.

"That's when Shannon Alford called me on 'A Purple Affair,'" Dechant said. Alford, an agriculture senator, told Dechant she was concerned that Cole had misused Dechant's proxy.

"Cole was doing what he thought was best," Dechant said. "Unfortunately, he didn't vote the way I would have."

Realizing they needed only one vote to have the meeting canceled, Alford urged Dechant to move to reconsider the amendment.

Dechant's first motion was ruled out of order because a roll call vote on moving the meeting to Tuesday had already been called, Michael Augustine, Senate parliamentarian, said.

The motion to move the meeting failed by a vote of 23-26 with six senators abstaining, Augustine said.

"After the motion to move the meeting failed, Dechant then made a new motion to cancel the Senate meeting this week," Augustine said.

Dechant wasn't the only senator to reconsider. He said he thought it was good the meeting was canceled because several senators were planning to skip the meeting and take an absence.

"I personally believe the decision removes us from the ivory tower," Dechant said. "It shows we can take a week off and support K-State like everyone else."

However, not all members of Senate shared Dechant's view.

"The whole thing could have been avoided by making the motion in advance," Mark Tomb, Privilege Fee Committee chairman, said. "I think it's bad."

Tuesday night would still have been open if the motion to change the meeting had been made as soon as senators knew the Tuesday night meeting had been canceled.

Tomb said that although the issues that were supposed to be on Thursday's agenda probably wouldn't spark much debate, canceling the meeting will bog things down later.

"Students are the ones who end up being screwed," Tomb said.

Gip Githens, education senator, said he thought canceling the meeting made Senate look self-serving.

"I just think it was kind of selfish," he said. "I would have liked to see the meeting stay on Thursday night."

Githens said that even though he is a member of a fraternity, he would rather have seen the Senate meeting moved to Tuesday than to have it canceled.

"We have business to do," Githens said, "and I'm not compromising on that."

John Potter, Senate chairman, was unavailable for comment.

VISIT

Partnership for Paraguay, an exchange program with Paraguay.

The program has been unilateral in the past because of Paraguay's former government, he said.

"One of the problems in the past has been that we have been ruled by a military government," Riquelme said.

But since Wasmosy was elected in May of 1993, the government has not been under military rule, Riquelme said.

"Now that we have a civilian president, we can have a bilateral arrangement. Only recently are we able to send some of our people for community service projects," Riquelme said.

Wasmosy attended a legislative lunch with Jon Wefald, president of K-State, and watched the first half of the football game between K-State and KU before leaving for Topeka.

The K-State Marching Band played Paraguay's national anthem in honor of the President's visit to the campus.

"It was excellent having the president of Paraguay here. It was unfortunate that it was a rushed visit," Wefald said.

Reagan said there will be similar visits with executives from other countries in the future.

Homecoming KICKOFF

Crazy Cat Kickoff starts festivities for week by Jennifer Taylor

A string of donuts dripping with chocolate was held over competitors' heads during Homecoming Week's first event at Weber Arena Monday.

The annual Crazy Cat Kickoff, sponsored by the K-State Association of Residence Halls, included four different games, including the chocolate donut eating contest.

Team members for each residence hall laid on the ground while two other teammates held a string of three donuts dripping with chocolate syrup over that person's head. The team members on the ground had to eat the donut without using their hands.

Lucas Dickson, freshman in electrical and computer engineering, won the heat for the Smurthwaite Scholarship House team.

"I feel fine. I could go and eat more," Dickson said after finishing three donuts.

Ten teams participated. The teams were made up of five men and five women from combined residence halls.

"This is the only residence hall-only event for the week," Jason Oblander, junior in history and political science, said.

Before the games were explained, shouts and chants were echoing from the bleachers.

One fired-up team member yelled, "We're going to win. What do you think about that?" to an opposing team member.

"The games being played are a major way to get points. This is similar to the way greks get points," Julia Trowbridge, junior in architectural engineering, said.

"Poop the potato," a trivia game and "white cloud" were the other three games played at Monday night's competition.

Poop the potato required teams to line up single file and one at a time run to the opposite end with a potato between their legs. The object was to not drop it along the way. When running team members reached the other end, they had to drop the potato in a bucket, then run back so the next person in line could go.

The trivia game required all team members to work together to get a final answer.

White cloud was played to wrap up the evening. Team members surrounded a bowl filled with flour, each team member had a straw and the object of the game was to blow all the flour out and retrieve the penny buried at the bottom of the bowl.

As teams were leaving and points were being tallied, a white cloud of flour remained over the tables.

Goodnow came in first, followed by the Haymaker/Boyd Scrubs, and Moore Pain followed up in third place.

Quebec votes to stay

Associated Press

MONTREAL — By a perilously narrow margin, Quebecers heeded pleas for national unity and voted against secession Monday, sparing Canada a traumatic fracture but leaving the French-speaking province split down the middle.

With more than 99 percent of the 22,400 polling stations reporting, the federalists, with 2,339,414 votes, led by 50.5 percent to 2,294,145 votes, or 49.5 percent, for the separatists. Federalists celebrated raucously at their headquarters, while separatists — who came closer than many had dreamed a few months ago — wept.

But Quebec's separatists, who lost a 1980 independence referendum by a 60-40 margin, improved their performance so dramatically this time that they are sure to shake off their disappointment and launch another try.

"Canada on paper may still be a country — but there's something wrong with this country," said

Student Tribunal said Monday the Senate Operations Committee and Student Senate are only supposed to review evidence in impeachment proceedings.

Although Tribunal has not issued an official interpretation of the Student Governing Association Constitution and By-laws in regards to impeachment proceedings, its informal decision was that the impeachment cases are only supposed to be tried by Tribunal.

John Potter, Senate chair, asked for an interpretation of the constitution and by-laws as to the process that should be followed in impeachment proceedings.

Potter requested the interpretation after Senate Operation Committee failed Oct. 23 to sponsor a bill of impeachment against Michael Henry, arts

Residence halls welcome children

James Dierking
staff reporter

The Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls is inviting ghosts and goblins into the halls from 6 to 8 p.m. Halloween.

Trick-or-treaters from the Manhattan community can knock on identified doors and ask K-State students for a treat.

"There are a lot of Manhattan residents and K-State employees who bring their children," Kim Winkler, director of Haymaker Hall, said.

"It's an enclosed place that's safe from the weather and other things. The only time they have to be outside is when they're traveling from building to building."

Doors of participating residents will be decorated with six-by-eight inch purple welcome signs.

"It's a chance for students to participate, some for the first time, on the giving end of Halloween instead of the receiving end," said Brent Marsh, junior in sociology and Moore Hall resident.

The residence halls will also offer tour guides and roaming spooks to help the children find their way around the halls to participating residents' rooms, said Leanna Coffman, sophomore in secondary education and Putnam Hall resident.

"It's a good thing to do for the community. Plus, it's kind of fun to see the kids in their costumes," said Kristi Salmans, sophomore in public relations and resident of West Hall.

In the past, each residence hall has organized its own Halloween activities. But this year, KSUARH coordinated all of the residence halls together to participate during Trick-or-treat. Smell my feet. Give me something good to eat.

Witches, ghosts and goblins will be roaming the streets tonight, and the Delta Tau Delta pledge class wanted to make sure all the ghouls would be safe.

Phil Garrison, freshman in business management, Teddy Blincoe, freshman in mass communications, and Chris Foley, junior in kinesiology, represented the Delt pledges as they talked to the students Friday at Bluemont Elementary School.

"It makes you feel good, and you know you're helping the kids out," Garrison said.

The 350 elementary students sat attentively while Garrison, Blincoe and Foley told them to go out in groups with at least one adult, go to well-lighted houses, take a flashlight and check their candy for foreign objects.

Suzanne Burnett, the At-Risk Aide for fourth grade, said she thought the children learned a lot.

"They love when the college kids come and talk to them," Burnett said. "I think they learned a lot and will remember it."

At the end of their presentation, Garrison, Blincoe and Foley asked the children questions. The students waved their hands frantically as they anxiously waited to be called on, and correct answers were rewarded with candy.

"I like working with children because it makes me feel young again," Blincoe said.

Elizabeth Boone, principal of Bluemont Elementary, said the Delt fraternity called her and wanted to adopt the school. She said they come every day for noon recess and play with the kids.

Boone said she wanted the Dels to be good role models for the students.

WIFE, HUSBAND STILL IN LOVE AFTER SHE TRIED TO HAVE HIM KILLED

RIVERSIDE, Ohio (AP) — What's a little murder plot between man and wife?

Stephen and Kim Kay Perisie are trying to patch up their 22-year marriage as she awaits sentencing for trying to have him killed for his millions in lottery winnings.

Friends call them crazy. They don't disagree.

"Love is a state of insanity anyway," Kim Perisie said.

Kim Perisie faces up to 25 years in prison when she's sentenced Nov. 17 for trying to hire a hit man to kill her husband for $500.

The couple's 21-year-old son overheard her discussing the prospect with her boyfriend on the telephone in May and called police, prosecutor Frances McGee said. An undercover officer posing as a killer-for-hire was sent out and Kim Perisie gave him a $25 down payment, McGee said.

Stephen Perisie hit the Ohio lottery twice, winning $3 million in 1990 and $100,000 in 1992. Authorities said his wife wanted for herself the $107,000 a year her husband is collecting for 20 years.

In spite of it all, both Perisies insist they remain in love. With each other.

Stephen Perisie, 43, believes that his 40-year-old wife — aside from the affair and murder plot — has been a good mother to their two sons.

"That's a start," Stephen Perisie said. "Our oldest boy has had a lot of problems. We lost a couple of children together (during pregnancies). You don't wash 22 years under the bridge."

Stephen Perisie said police in Riverside, a Dayton suburb, warned him of the plot.

Kim Perisie has said it was a serious proposal. She pleaded guilty Oct. 20 and is free, pending sentencing, on $50,000 bail put up by her husband.

Stephen Perisie has said he was offended by the paltry price his wife put on his head.

"She tried to be very cheap about this," he said.

DETROIT PREPARES FOR DEVIL'S NIGHT WITH PATROLS, VOLUNTEERS

DETROIT (AP) — Hundreds of vacant buildings were razed so they couldn't be set on fire, and thousands volunteered to patrol the streets Monday for this year's drive against the destructive Devil's Night tradition.

"The primary thing is to keep the fires away, to protect lives and property," said Cliff Russell, a spokesman for Detroit's mayor. The night before Halloween has for years been celebrated as Devil's Night in Detroit, a night of arson fires in trash piles and houses.

Devil's Night fires peaked at 297 in 1985 but declined after then-Mayor Coleman Young initiated a major anti-arson campaign enlisting thousands of Detroiters to safeguard their city.

Late Sunday, firefighters reported 35 fires. The city's daily average is 40 to 60 blazes.

This year, at least 25,000 volunteers signed up to patrol streets, a number similar to previous years during Young's administration.

Juveniles were under a 6 p.m. to 6 a.m. curfew.

The city also demolished more than 1,800 vacant buildings in the past two months, towed more than 2,000 abandoned cars and removed 190,000 discarded tires to keep them from being used as fuel.

This year's campaign to extinguish Devil's Night came amid something of an economic resurgence for Detroit. The city is experiencing the biggest housing boom since the 1950s, with plans to build a $235 million downtown ball park to be used by the Detroit Tigers.

GROUPS FILE SUIT AGAINST EPA

KANSAS CITY, Kan. (AP) — Two environmental groups have filed a lawsuit in U.S. District Court against the Environmental Protection Agency, alleging a large number of violations of the federal Clean Water Act in Kansas.

The suit alleges that the EPA has failed to ensure that the Kansas Department of Health and Environment has taken required steps to protect the quality of Kansas surface waters.

The lawsuit was filed by the Kansas Sierra Club and the Kansas Natural Resource Council.

It alleges that the EPA has made procedural errors in supervising KDHE so that Kansas has never been able to meet its water quality standards.

Pi Kappa chapter bell stolen Saturday

Nicole Kirby
staff reporter

The Pi Kappa Phi woke up Sunday morning to find their bell stolen from the front yard.

"It's kind of a ritual for all the drunks coming back from Aggieville to ring the bell," said Pi Kap president Aaron Floersch, senior in business management. "This time they decided to steal it."

The bell is the Pi Kap's public symbol, so every chapter of the fraternity has one.

"It was at our old house up the street before it burned down," Floersch said.

Social chair Brian Boone, sophomore in physical therapy and psychology, discovered the bell was missing about 8:30 a.m. Sunday.

"I was just up walking around and I saw some people walking around out there, and I thought they might be alumni so I went out to talk to them," Boone said. "They were standing around the bell, and then I noticed that there was no bell."

The people in the yard were neighbors who had come to notify the Pi Kaps that the bell was missing.

"We reported it, and they filled out a theft report. They said they'll investigate, but I'm sure it's not one of their top priorities," Floersch said.

Floersch said he estimated the bell was worth about $750, and damage to the Pi Kap property was about $50.

If the Riley County Police Department cannot recover the bell, the Pi Kaps will try to find another one.

"It's very sentimental to the house, because this is all that made it back from the old house that burned down," vice president Michael Henry, senior in marketing, said. "It's been around longer than the rest of us."

The Pi Kaps use the bell when they sign new members and in other fraternity ceremonies.

"If someone did this as a prank, it was in very poor taste," Henry said. "It's like defiling what we stand for."

Delayed learning

Adult and Family Learning Center helps upgrade education levels

by Claudette Riley

Changing the direction of the lives of people who walk through its door is the goal of the Adult and Family Learning Center in Manhattan.

Martha Kastens, director and K-State alumna, said she became interested in helping adults achieve their education goals after teaching secondary education for 15 years and instructing a night class at a community college.

"To me, it's enough to see that they've taken a step, which leads them in a new direction and will open doors and allow for more opportunities," Kastens said.

Under-educated adults can learn the alphabet, improve basic skills or achieve a high-school diploma through the center's adult basic education, GED preparation and English as a second language classes.

The center's mission is to serve adults in the Manhattan and Ogden communities who chose to upgrade their current skills, Kastens said.

"We also have an adult literacy program," Kastens said. "We constantly ask what we can do to make it easier for our students to be here. With adults, there are always barriers to overcome. For some, they have transportation problems or child care concerns."

Child care is provided free of charge during morning classes. About 60 students attend English classes each week, and about 15 students attend the ABE/GED classes that include computer keyboarding skills.

About 15 additional people take GED tests at the center each Monday evening.

Candie White, volunteering special needs coordinator, pairs students with volunteer tutors from the community. White teaches a series of classes that train volunteers how to teach new readers.

"I'm not looking for trained teachers. I'm looking for people that want to help others and can be conscientious about making this type of commitment," White said.

CARY CONOVER/Collegian

Joyce Scritchfield, volunteer tutor for the Adult and Family Learning Center (left), helps Trudy Thomas, Manhattan resident, with her reading skills during a tutoring session at the center.

The pool of tutoring volunteers includes retired adults, professors, students and full-time employees from a variety of professions.

"It's just amazing to me that the ones who are the busiest find a few extra hours each week to volunteer," White said. "Scheduling is important in matching the student and tutor. It's a juggling act like putting a puzzle together."

Once a match is made, an orientation meeting helps the student and tutor set goals.

"Sometimes a student will have a long-range goal, and we'll help them break it down into bite-sized pieces," White said. "These are adults we're working with, and they seem to be more motivated. They're here because they want to be here and end up really being very good students."

Students study "Adult New Readers" materials, which provides adult-interest books at a basic reading level through a joint $10,000 grant with Manhattan Public Library.

More than 90 percent of the tutoring sessions are at the center, though some pairs agree to meet at Farrell Library, the Manhattan Public Library or the K-State Student Union.

Joyce Scritchfield, a retired Manhattan resident, began volunteering in September. She said she believes taking the tutor training course helped prepare her to work with her student, Trudy Thomas, Manhattan resident.

"It prepares us to work with someone, with students who have all different types of skills and needs," Scritchfield said. "First we taught survival words like names, addresses and the word 'exit.' Then we went to sight words and different parts of the alphabet."

Penny Suleiman, ABE/GED instructor for the past 10 years, said she has taught students from age 16 to 65.

"It's hard for any adult to return to school. I have the utmost respect for my students, because it is so hard to come back," Suleiman said. "The main challenge, I feel, is that they lack the self-confidence. Although they have lived life and have talents, they don't feel comfortable enough."

Suleiman said she believes one of the best ways to learn something is by teaching it to others.

"I often turn the class over to a student. It's important that they realize that each of us must learn from our mistakes," she said. "I do a lot of group teaching that way, because it forms a bond. My students come to class and can find out that there are other people in the same boat."

The psychological aspect of getting a GED diploma is great, Suleiman said.

"There is a misconception on the part of society about the dropout. Some of them drop out for reasons that have nothing to do with them," Suleiman said. "The range of students in my classes are so varied. Balancing is the most difficult aspect. We all have something to contribute. I learn from them. I learn that I can achieve and that I can progress."

in our opinion

Student Halloween activities reach community

Students are reaching into the community and giving back to Manhattan tonight.

Ghosts and ghouls will be tip-toeing around town tonight, and college students need to watch out on the streets and in their residence halls.

A few of your college peers are offering safe food and environments for the children of Manhattan and should be recognized for their kind deeds on this ghastly night.

The residence halls will be opening their doors from 6 to 8 p.m. to tiny witches and goblins from across town.

Kim Winkler, director of Haymaker Hall, said the halls are offering a safe and enclosed environment for the children to trick-or-treat. And doors with marked purple signs will pass out candy to the children.

The halls have offered this in the past, but have never bonded together campus wide to offer trick-or-treating at the same time.

This year, the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls has taken time to organize the night and eliminate confusion for Manhattan residents.

Some greek houses and various organizations are also offering candy or special programs for children of Manhattan.

Often, the good things students do go unnoticed.

However, tonight — the most evil night of the year — shows kindness at every doorstep.

Students are reaching into the community and giving back to Manhattan tonight.

So if you're wondering where to go to get candy tonight, think about all the other peers who are giving candy away and go steal from them.

Just kidding — remember the example they are setting by giving back to the community.

Subsidies signal need for welfare reform

All the time, I hear from people who believe welfare needs to be reformed. I couldn't agree more.

We've all heard the stories about people getting rich from public assistance.

Something tells me this wasn't the reason these programs were set up.

Many of the cases I object to most, though, don't involve women, infants or children at all.

They involve giant corporations who use government programs to pad their pockets.

My favorite example of a welfare king is Dwayne Andreas, CEO of agricultural giant Archer Daniels Midland. If anyone needs to be thrown off the public dole, he would be it.

The way ADM receives its welfare checks is three-fold.

First, many of the company's primary products are made with corn, which it receives at subsidized prices. Because the price is kept steady, this also allows the company to plan long term.

Second is an indirect subsidy ADM receives from sugar. Sugar subsidizes limit production, making the price of cane sugar artificially high.

ADM is one of the largest producers of corn sweeteners, the sweetening agent in soft drinks and many other products. When cane prices are kept high, ADM is free from the economic competition.

Finally, and most directly, ADM gets 54 cents per-gallon tax credit for corn-derived ethanol.

According to Mother Jones Magazine, ADM produces 60 percent of all ethanol in this country.

Because the government has allocated 3.5 billion for this program during the next five years, this results in $2.1 billion in taxes ADM doesn't have to pay.

The Progressive Policy Institute describes ADM's federally backed plan this way: "ADM begins by buying corn at subsidized prices."

"Then it uses the corn to make corn sweeteners, which are subsidized by the sugar program. Then it uses the remainder for the big subsidy, which is ethanol."

As bad as all of this is, the methods used to maintain this sweet deal are even worse. CEO Dwayne Andreas has made sure our government is the best money can buy.

According to Mother Jones Magazine, in 1992 Andreas gave more than $1.4 million in soft money that goes directly to party organizations as opposed to individual candidates.

In addition to this, he gave $345,650 to individual senatorial and congressional candidates.

Former President Bush received numerous payments culminating in a $400,000 check for a fund-raising dinner in April 1992. Because Bush lost, Andreas has been shipping money to Clinton.

According to Common Cause, as of mid-1994 Andreas had contributed $270,000 to Clinton, making him one of the President's largest benefactors.

And what has Andreas received for his money?

Only a slyly inserted clause in the Clean Air Act stipulating that 30 percent of the gasoline sold in America's nine most-polluted cities contain ethanol additives.

Without this stipulation, many refineries would have chose to use methanol, which is cheaper and easier to transport.

Andreas' best friend in Washington, D.C., however, is none other than our good friend, U.S. Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan. These guys are so buddy-buddy that not only do they vacation together, but they own side-by-side condominiums in Bal Harbour, Fla.

Dole has long been ethanol's biggest champion. He made sure the aforementioned 54 cents per-gallon tax subsidy applied solely to ethanol and not methanol as well.

In 1980, he sponsored a tariff on imported ethanol, and in 1990 he added numerous pro-ethanol amendments to the Clean Air Act.

Despite the fact taxpayers have made him and his family richer than any welfare mother ever dreamed, Andreas views himself as being essential to the workings of this country.

Quoted in an interview earlier this year with freelance reporter Dan Carney, Andreas said, "Did somebody dream there is some way the government doesn't need us? What in the hell would they do with the farm program without us?"

Well, by gosh, I never thought of it that way.

I guess we're lucky to have such smart criminals being an essential need of our country.

Something tells me we can do better.

Companies like ADM need to learn to survive without government help.

If any companies out there get subsidies, it should be ones that are new and in need of support. This is where jobs can be created, not in giant corporations where the bottom line dictates the elimination of more and more workers.

In this year of budget slashing, Congress needs to stop being hypocritical and look at eliminating many corporate subsidies.

They have only waged class warfare up until now.

► HELP FOR HUNGRY

Editor,

Each year, at about this time, concerned community members come together to address the continuing challenge of hunger among about 2,000 families in our community. Many people are surprised to learn nearly one-third of the students enrolled in public schools in Manhattan receive free or reduced-priced lunches.

To reduce hunger in our community, especially during the holiday season, we must reach out to everyone for help.

The Mayor's Holiday Tree, a fund/food drive for the Flint Hills Breadbasket, will once again strive to provide holiday meals for these families during the November and December holiday seasons.

But, in order to be successful, we need your help.

In past years, the support from the K-State community has been fantastic.

Whether you participated as a member of an organized campus club or organization, the greek community or as a concerned individual; whether you helped Cats for Cans, the pie toss, miss-a-meal or tossed a few cans in one or more of the many food collection points, please accept our heartfelt thanks.

You made a big difference. But here's the bottom line — we really need your help this year. If you helped last year, perhaps you could encourage a friend to participate with you. If you haven't been involved, watch the Collegian for opportunities or call Shirley at the Breadbasket at 537-0730, or Ruth Ann Wefald at 539-2412, and ask, "What can I do?"

Mark your calendar for the Hunger experience dinner at 6 p.m. Nov. 5 in the K-State Student Union. This event simulates world hunger; you take a chance of getting one of the few great meals or getting what 60-80 percent of the world might be eating. Tickets are available for $15 from the Breadbasket.

► GOALPOST DESTRUCTION

Editor,

As an alumnus of K-State, I enjoyed the game a great deal on Saturday.

However, the group of students who tore down the goalposts really disappointed me.

I don't want to hear any griping from students the next time ticket prices go up — the goalpost destroyers are part of the reason. I am glad to see the number of students on the field has significantly decreased from years past.

But I have one message for those who thought it necessary to tear them down again: Keep your asses off the field!

Finally, at both the 1994 Nebraska game and Saturday's game against Kansas, we allowed the opposing team's bands to come.

This is OK, but not to the point that you can't hear our band. KU's band was directly in front of our seats and insisted on playing constantly.

Although I do enjoy listening to them at half, they need to be told when they can play. It's just part of home field advantage.

Congratulations to Coach Snyder and the Wildcats on an outstanding game and season.

FEARFUL CHRISTIANS RUIN CHILDREN'S HALLOWEEN FUN

Let us take a moment on this, our nation's greatest holiday, to reflect on just how cool Halloween is.

Halloween isn't just a chance for children to gorge themselves. For adults, it's the chance to at least play at concealing their identities, an important ritual that is not often practiced in the United States.

Halloween can inspire creativity that has been all but squeezed out of holidays like Christmas by powerful marketing forces.

Halloween is one of the few non-religious holidays we have, and thus one of the few holidays that children can celebrate in school.

Halloween is the inspiration for some of the best parties thrown all year.

Halloween is a chance to trot out all of our silly superstitions, our fear of the dark, and laugh at it.

All in all, it's a very healthy holiday, so it's no surprise that fundamentalist Christians around the country are trying to ban the celebration of Halloween in their children's school districts.

What's wrong with Halloween, you might ask? Well, says the Christian, I'm glad you asked.

Apparently, Halloween sends the wrong message to America's youth.

For a young child, the choice between hellfire plus candy vs. salvation plus no candy is really no choice at all.

(If only these poor, doomed youngsters knew how bad burning candy smells.)

Does equating Halloween with the fires of hell seem a little extreme? That's only because you are one of the poor, unfortunate souls imbued with common sense.

On CNN, I saw one man address his school board. He said he was involved with satanism and witchcraft when he was young, human sacrifice, too. (He saw the bones himself.)

And how did he get mixed up in the occult? Yup, you guessed it, it all started with Halloween.

That's the way he said it, too, each syllable it's own word. It's like the way a lot of ministers used to say rock 'n' roll.

Desensitizing our youth to witches makes them that much more vulnerable when the real witches come along, or so says Mr. Missionary.

That's your average missionary fanatic for you. He had a messed-up childhood, and the only way he can deal with it is to screw it up for the rest of us.

What really bugs me about these people is they are trying to scare children. Ghosts and goblins are real, whisper the Christians, be afraid. Halloween is evil.

Children watch so much television these days, they have enough trouble distinguishing between reality and fantasy.

Imagine trying to get them to believe there really are monsters under the bed, and they don't just want to eat you, but want to drag your soul to the deepest pits of hell. Well, that's just wrong.

But that's what these Christian crusaders believe. They actually believe in goblins, ghosts and devils.

I guess it isn't really that surprising, though. After all, consider the other crazy things that they believe.

These people believe, inexplicably, some omnipotent being created the world in seven days, including all the creatures, mountains, etc., along with fossil records that show the earth to be much older than it is.

These people believe there was a guy who could, with a touch, heal lepers, heal the blind, multiply food and walk on water.

These people believe this guy got crucified, died, was buried, and came back to life three days later, all without the benefit of so much as a shot of penicillin.

And these people believe all this because some religiously inspired (for example, totally insane) people wrote it down that way.

If they believe all that, they'll believe anything.

CANDY'S FUN, BUT DON'T FORGET Halloween safety

Sara Edwards
staff writer

Halloween is a time when children are rewarded with gobs of candy just for looking cute. But one thing that can be forgotten during all this hoopla is safety.

Parents need to be sure their children's costumes are safe. They also need to make sure where their children get the candy is safe, said Larry George, Riley County Police Department D.A.R.E. officer.

A safe costume doesn't interfere with movement. Children should try their costumes on well in advance of Halloween night to make sure they fit.

If the costume has a mask, open up the eye holes a little more so it won't obstruct vision, George said.

Costumes should also be easily visible at night. Lightly colored costumes, reflective tape and reflective vests enable children to be more easily seen, he said.

Some fabrics have reflective materials in them, said Dennis Marten, owner of Ben Franklin Crafts.

George also said children should be careful with animals because animals might be frightened of them in a costume. Flashlights should be used inside of jack-o-lanterns instead of candles so children's costumes don't catch on fire.

Parents should always check the candy before the children eat it. If the candy is unwrapped or the wrapper is open it should be thrown away, said George.

Parents should always accompany children and they should only trick-or-treat in familiar areas, he said.

"Trick-or-treating in unfamiliar areas is always dangerous," George said.

George suggested taking children to organized events to trick-or-treat.

"A lot of the possible danger could be eliminated by attending organized events rather than going door-to-door," George said.

Sunset Zoological Park is having Spooktacular again this year. It runs through today from 6 to 8:30 p.m.

"We like to provide an opportunity for safe treats and additional Halloween fun for children," Angie Fenstermacher, marketing director for Sunset Zoo, said.

The zoo will have 31 candy stations as well as face painting, an animal program and story telling, Fenstermacher said. Children younger than 12 years old should be accompanied by an adult.

The Manhattan Town Center is having a Boo Party and a trick-or-treat parade Tuesday between 6 and 8 p.m. Stores handing out candy will have posters in the windows.

The Boo Party will be in center court. There will be movies and candy for the children. Free photographs will also be available.

The Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls is coordinating with the individual residence halls to let the children come in for trick-or-treating. Each hall is recruiting their own people. There will be signs on the door-knobs to let people know who is participating, said Jason Oblander, KSUARH environmental chair and junior in history and political science.

Manhattan's haunted history sends shivers down the spine

Nate Shilling
staff writer

Part of Manhattan's history includes the inexplicable.

While some of the hype about ghosts may only be rumors, several buildings and sites in town have historical registry of these events both at the Riley County Historical Society and the KSU University Archives.

One of the more well-known ghosts lives at the Purple Masque Theater.

A mischievous ghost named Nick likes to rearrange chairs, stomp up and down stairs, levitate things and talk on tape recorders.

Nick is thought to be an ex-football player who died in the building when it was used as an athletic dormitory. He was carried to the cafeteria, which is now the Purple Masque Theater, following a minor game injury and died on the table shortly after.

As the story goes, his parents were on their way to watch the game and died in a car accident at the same time of Nick's death. He continues to haunt the site with his playful spirit — he is supposedly waiting for his parents to arrive — but is thought to be a friendly ghost who looks after the place.

Another infamous haunting is at the Delta Sigma Phi house, where two ghosts from the days when the building was the St. Mary's Hospital still roam the halls.

Although the specter of the roaming nurse hasn't been seen since the 1960s, the noisy ghost of George has been heard on the third floor, and students used to blame him for poltergeist effects.

George was a patient who died in a freakish accident when the hospital was moving to its new location. He rolled off his bed in a third-floor room and was wedged against the wall where he eventually suffocated, unnoticed until the next day.

In 1973, an ice storm caused the power at the Delta Sigma Phi house to go out for several days, but it would return each day just in time to watch Star Trek and would go off again following the show.

Another more recent experience occurred at the Pi Kappa Phi house. Beginning when the house was occupied by the Theta Xis, the house continues to reveal haunting evidence of the presence of the ghost "Duncan."

Duncan, a Theta Xi pledge in the 1950s, was killed in the library from a blow to the head during paddling. The paddle was hung in the library as a memorial to him, but it was taken down when the Theta Xis moved out. A shadow of the paddle and blood stains on the wall remained following many attempts to cover it up until recent remodeling by the Pi Kappas several years ago.

In 1974, the Fijis held a seance where one of the participants began screaming as he felt Duncan start to take over his body. The others at the seance swore his fingernails turned a glowing green color. Many other events including countless noises, mysterious sightings and unexplained occurrences have happened since then and continue today.

Past residents of the Lambda Chi Alpha house have seen a ghost named Polly Pi Phi walk in and out of rooms.

The Kappa Sigma house has had sightings of the ghost of a student who hanged himself in a file room there. His specter takes the shape of a moving white haze and has been seen all over the house. In the spring of 1992, two Kappa Sig pledges were studying after watching a video tape and then turned it off. While they were studying, the tape ejected itself while the power was still off to the machine.

At the Triangle house, the image of a woman has been seen and heard walking around during a holiday break. In addition, a member staying the house during Thanksgiving break woke up to the sound of a small child giggling. He went back to bed only to wake up a second time to the same sound, but this time something was tugging on his sleeve. When he opened his eyes, he saw the image of a small boy who ran off.

Other sites in Manhattan have had similar occurrences. Farrell Library has had students report ghosts up in the eighth stacks, and employees have reported a little old lady wandering about early in the morning.

The Goodnow House, on Claffin Road at the Riley County Historical Society has said to be haunted by friendly ghosts. Strong aromas of fresh laundry, apples and hot chocolate have been sensed by patrons and employees.

In addition, odd noises and unexplained occurrences have happened during the years since its vacancy in 1970.

Haunted house creates thrills, chills for a cause

Halloween frights can be found all around Manhattan tonight.

To keep up with its Halloween tradition, the Manhattan Jaycees will have their 17th-annual haunted house from 7 to midnight tonight.

The admission price is $3 for children ages 12 and younger and $5 for adults.

The haunted house is next to Cactus Jack's Mexican Cafe & Cantina and behind ALCO Discount Stores on Anderson Avenue.

The haunted house has four rooms and a hallway.

Each has a scene with actors meant to thrill and chill.

The Jaycees use everyday items from tin foil to fans to create their house of horror.

Mark Queen, a member of the Manhattan Jaycees, said the haunted house is a revenue generator for community-based projects.

This year some of the funds will go to Sunset Zoological Park for the refurbishing of the Manhattan Jaycees building.

"Sunday from one to four is a kids day, lights-on deal. It will be a chance for children to walk through the haunted house and meet the ghosts and goblins," Queen said.

Paula Roehr, senior in business management, is the chairperson for the haunted house.

"I moved here in January, and I wanted to get involved in the community somehow," Roehr said.

"I probably won't be chairman (next year), but I will definitely help," she said.

The Jaycees have been part of the Manhattan community for 58 years. About 30 of their 165 members helped with the haunted house.

"We have a really good group of people," Roehr said.

One thousand to 5,000 people attend the Manhattan Jaycees haunted house every year. Queen said he is optimistic about this year's turnout, too.

"We expect to run through more people than ever. We will raise probably $4,000-$5,000. That's what we really need to support the projects in the community," he said.

ORIOLES HIRE NEW MANAGER

BALTIMORE (AP) — The Baltimore Orioles hired Davey Johnson as manager Monday, one year after rejecting him for the same job.

The former Cincinnati Reds manager received a three-year contract, the terms of which were not disclosed.

"It sure feels great to be home and I consider this home," said Johnson, who played second base for Baltimore from 1965 to 1972. "It's a dream come true."

SportsCOLSTON BIG 8 DEFENSIVE PLAYER OF THE WEEK

Senior defensive tackle Tim Colston was awarded league defensive honors Monday after a 10-tackle, two-quarterback sack, performance Saturday in K-State's 41-7 victory over Kansas.

Colston is one of 12 semifinalists for the 1995 Lombardi Award, honoring the nation's most outstanding lineman. He has 50 tackles on the season, including five sacks.

Cotton Bowl best bet for the 7-1 Cats

There is one word that can describe Saturday's game at KSU Stadium's Wagner Field.

Domination. K-State dominated just about every aspect of the game against the Kansas Jayhawks in front of a record KSU Stadium crowd of 44,284.

The Wildcats got it started with special teams. On the first possession of the game, the Cats got a safety on a punt that couldn't be handled by Kansas punter Darrin Simmons.

Was it me, or could anyone else see the look on Simon's face when a swarm of Cats came running toward him in the back of the end zone? He had the look of a deer in front of car headlights. On the Jayhawks' next possession, the Cats blocked yet another punt. Six plays later, Matt Miller found Kevin Lockett in the end zone.

On defense, the Cats didn't surprise me too much. It is what I would expect out of the No. 1-ranked defense in the country. If others would recognize that our defense is really that good, they wouldn't have been surprised either.

Kansas came in with one of the better rushing attacks in the country. But Saturday, the Jayhawks backs looked like pee-wees in a land of giants. The dynamic duo of L.T. Levine and June Henley combined on 13 carries for 27 yards.

The Cats looked like the team that had one of the best rushing attacks in the nation.

Everybody knows what a great job the offensive line did for opening running lanes for Hickson and Lawrence. But I would like to give a little credit to the fullbacks and wide receivers.

I paid particular attention to these positions during the game. Continually I saw holes being opened by fullbacks Dederick Kelly and Brian Goolsby. Down the field, I saw wide receivers Lockett, Mitch Running, and Tyson Schwiager holding their blocks, allowing an extra 5 yards or so to be gained by the running backs.

So after Saturday's victory, where do the Cats stand in the bowl picture?

With the win, the Cats moved to 7-1 and into the ninth slot in the AP Top 25. The best-case scenario would be for the Cats to finish the season at 10-1. This is a good possibility with home games against a struggling Oklahoma team and an up and down team in Colorado. Sandwiched between these games is a road trip to Ames, Iowa to face Iowa State.

At 10-1, the Cats would most likely finish second in the Big 8. This would earn them a trip to the Cotton Bowl. Yes, the Cats could actually be playing on New Year's Day.

If the Cats made it to Dallas, they would face either the WAC champion or the second place team in the Pac-10. In the Pac-10, the Cats would probably face either Oregon or Washington. In the WAC, it could be either BYU, San Diego State, Air Force or Utah. This division is wide open.

If the Cats were to lose one of their three remaining games, they would be looking at two different bowl games. The first is the Alamo Bowl, which puts the Big 8 No. 4 against the Big 10 No. 4. Most likely they would be facing either Penn State or Michigan, who are at three and four in the standings now.

At 8-2, the Cats could also go to Holiday Bowl, which puts the Big 8 No. 3 against the WAC champion or Pac-10 No. 2.

If the Cats have a complete breakdown and lose two or three of their last games, they would have the possibilities of going to the Copper Bowl or the Aloha Bowl. Both of these bowls take the Big 8's No. 5 or 6 teams.

But if I were you Cat fans, I wouldn't worry too much about the last two scenarios. My worries would be on getting my things packed and finding a ticket for a showdown probably against the Oregon Ducks in the Cotton Bowl.

Teams fare well in Big 8 Championships

Men place 4th, women finish 5th in Friday's races

Ryan O'Halloran
contributing writer

The wind wasn't a problem for the K-State men's cross country team at Friday's Big 8 Championships in Lawrence, but the Wildcats had three other problems — Oklahoma State, Colorado and Iowa State.

While the fourth-ranked Cowboys, the second-ranked Buffaloes and the fifth-ranked Cyclones slugged it out for the top three positions, Coach Terry Drake's team ran a solid race finishing fourth, well behind third-place Iowa State, but well ahead of fifth-place Oklahoma.

The women's team finished fifth, but only 21 points out of second place.

Ryan Clive-Smith and John Thorpe led the Wildcat charge, finishing 13th and 20th, respectively.

Drake said, however, it was breakthrough runs by David Dominguez and Zach Davies that propelled K-State into fourth place.

Dominguez finished in 22nd, while Davies, a walk-on freshman, had the best outing of his career with a 34th-place finish.

"David had a really good race," Drake said. "We held him back a little bit and it seemed to help, but Zach Davies was probably the biggest surprise."

Drake said the success of the freshman came for hard work.

"He was the third freshman to finish and the top-American freshman. He had the breakthrough race two weeks ago at Iowa State, and he's just getting better. He's adjusting to the training load, and he's a better athlete than we expected," Drake said.

Even though there was a heavy wind, it didn't affect the outcome.

"Almost all of our guys ran personal records, but it made the strategy different," Drake said.

"We slowed down a lot to get behind people."

Although the Cats finished 53 points behind Iowa State, Drake said his team could beat the Cyclones.

"Iowa State can't make any mistakes in their top five, and if they do, we can beat them, but Oklahoma State and Colorado may be the best two teams in the country," Drake said. "They're really good."

While the top three finishers were given, K-State wanted to finish fourth.

"Out of top five, we had only one guy that ran sub-par," Drake said. "We really ran well, and we wanted to make sure we didn't get any lower than fourth."

On the women's side, Colorado proved they are the class of the conference by winning the race by 59 points against Iowa State.

The Buffaloes came into the event ranked first in the nation and will stay there.

But as Drake said before the race, the second through fifth positions were wide open. Iowa State finished second, followed by Missouri, Nebraska and K-State.

Irma Betancourt led K-State with a seventh-place finish, but the next K-State finisher wasn't until 23rd with Samantha McNamara.

Charity Swartz finished 24th with Cristy Swartz 30th and Ashlie Kinton 41st.

Betancourt started out with the leaders but eventually fell back to run by herself in the wind, and that hurt her.

"I thought she ran a really courageous race," Drake said. "She went out with the leaders, and then when (Colorado's) Patty Roberts pulled away from her, she was in no man's land because she was by herself running in the wind, and that takes a lot of you."

Drake said Charity Swartz ran a solid race because she continues to run faster times after rejoining the team in early September.

"The person that really moved up was Charity, and she's going to be huge on whether we go to nationals or not," Drake said.

"She really had a good race. She's the one that needs more time, and she's improving by 20 seconds everytime she runs. She's passing more people, and it's my hope that in two weeks, she passes more people."

K-State has this weekend off before the District race in Stillwater, Okla. The top two teams in each division automatically advance to nationals while the next three individuals not on those teams advance.

Iowa State can't make any mistakes in their top five, and if they do, we can beat them.

Jayhawks give Cats all the credit for Saturday's 41-7 win

Ryan O'Halloran
contributing writer

It was about 5:30 Saturday night, and the scene at KSU Stadium summed up the entire afternoon for the previously-unbeaten and used-to-be-sixth-ranked Kansas Jayhawks.

At one end zone sat a goal post that two hours earlier had been demolished. The same could be said for KU — they were demolished in every phase of the game as K-State romped 41-7 in the Sunflower Showdown.

KU was a team that came into Manhattan with a great rushing attack and solid offensive line, but it left town wondering what went wrong.

"You don't defend a team like they did without being a terrific team," Kansas head coach Glen Mason said. "That was a great team victory by them. They won defensively, offensively and in the kicking game."

While in the first two months of the season, nothing could go wrong for Kansas, nothing could go right for the Hawks on Saturday, especially offensively.

Statistically, it was a disaster — only nine first downs, 76 rushing yards and 155 yards total offense. KU quarterbacks were sacked eight times for 41 yards, and Kansas had to punt nine times.

"We're usually able to play on two or three cylinders," Mason said.

"But we weren't hitting on any today. This is not indicative of how we've played this year. I just hope it's inconsistent."

Going into the K-State game, the Jayhawks had rushed for more than 190 yards in five of their seven games.

"We wanted to completely shut down their running game," K-State co-defensive coordinator Jim Leavitt said.

KU's trouble on offense was compounded by the fact that the Jayhawk defense was nonexistent against the run as K-State gained 335 yards on the ground.

"Offensively and defensively, we didn't play up to our potential," KU linebacker Keith Rodgers said. "But it's a correctable problem."

"There was pressure on Mark Williams for most of the day," K-State coach Bill Snyder said. "And that's a pretty tough task. We did a nice job inside with Tim Colston and Ray Eagle. I think that our defensive front seven and our offensive line was the factor."

Colston and Eagle each picked up two sacks while Colston led the Cats with eight tackles.

"They came out with a lot of different fronts, and they had a lot of looks we hadn't prepared for," KU offensive tackle Rod Jones said.

But not so, defensive line coach Mike Stoops said.

"We didn't change much from what we've shown in the past," Stoops said. "It was nothing different."

After falling behind early, the Jayhawks looked like they had packed it in, but KU was in the game until Martin Gramatica's 32-yard field goal with four seconds left in the half.

"At times, you could tell they let up, but we couldn't let up because they came back against Oklahoma," said defensive end Dirk Ochs, who had three tackles.

Even before the thrashing of his team, Mason said he knew K-State was a good team on both sides of the football.

"I think they played well against Nebraska, especially defensively," Mason said. "They just got behind early, and what happened to them last week happened to us. We just didn't control the line of scrimmage."

VOLLEYBALL

Struggling Cats fall in three games to Sooners

Shana Newell
staff writer

There were two heartbreakers in Manhattan this weekend, and they did not belong only to the Jayhawks.

The K-State volleyball team dropped their second match of the season to Oklahoma Saturday night at Ahearn Field House, and it was a match the Cats desperately needed to win. The Sooner squad was able to silence the Wildcat attack in three easy games, 15-5, 15-10, and 15-8 to win the match.

Oklahoma, led by Patrice Arrington, came out hitting strong, out-performing the Cats in every facet of the game. OU did not stop until K-State was beaten.

Coach Jim Moore said he was disappointed by his team's performance.

"It's got to be them. They're the ones that have to win," Moore said.

"They're the ones who have to perform. Nobody else can do it for them."

The Sooners out hit K-State in every game. In fact, the Cats managed only a .091 attack in game one and .000 in game two. Oklahoma hit .303 and .200 respectively.

Although the Cats improved their team hitting to .273 for game three, they were still dominated by Oklahoma, who hit a solid .400.

Following this loss, the Cats are now 16-7 for the season and 3-5 in the Big 8. The Sooners are now 16-7 on the season, 4-3 in the conference.

Moore also said that at this point in the season, there is nothing the coaching staff can do for the team.

"I've told them how to win. I gave them the answers last week. Whether they do it or not, it's up to them," he said.

The Cats were led by freshman middle blocker Val Wieck and junior middle blocker Kate DeClerk.

Wieck had 10 kills in the match, hitting .368. She also led the team in block assists with eight and had one solo block.

DeClerk had seven kills, hitting .115. She led the team defensively with eight digs. DeClerk also had three block assists.

With Saturday's loss, K-State will have to overcome some tough obstacles in order to gain entry to the Big 8 tournament in November.

"It's just silly to play like this. Right now, the only way to get into the Big 8 tournament is to beat Colorado at Colorado."

The Cats will be looking for a conference win on the road at No. 1-ranked Nebraska Wednesday night. The Huskers defeated the Cats last month at home in three games.

Chicago Cubs All-Star 2nd baseman to attempt baseball comeback

At the time of his retirement, Ryne Sandberg, the 1984 NL MVP and holder of several major league fielding records, said he wanted to spend more time with his family, and said he had no intention of ever returning.

But just like another famous Chicago athlete who wore uniform No. 23 and retired this year, Michael Jordan, Sandberg has decided he'd been away too long from a sport he always loved.

Sandberg spent much of his time in retirement living at his home in Arizona, near the Cubs' spring training site in Mesa. Although he was not playing ball, his contract with the Cubs called for some off-field work for the team.

Sandberg recently remarried, and friends have described him as happier than he's been in a long time and said he's ready to return to the game he'd played professionally since he was 18.

Sandberg is a career .289 hitter with 245 home runs and 905 RBIs.

He won the Gold Glove from 1983-91, and holds major league records at second baseman for highest lifetime fielding percentage (.990) and consecutive games without an error (123).

Sandberg was picked by Philadelphia in the 20th round of the June 1978 draft and signed with the Phillies. He made his big league debut in 1981 as a shortstop and second baseman, and was traded in January 1982 with Larry Bowa to the Cubs for Ivan DeJesus.

He was an All-Star his last 10 seasons, from 1984 through 1993. In '93, his last full season, he hit .309. In 1994, he was hitting .258 in 57 games when he decided to retire.

REVIEW

Subversive subplots destroy excitement of 'Strange Days'

Claudette Riley

staff writer

Reviews can be deceiving. Advanced press for "Strange Days" promised a spell-binding, visually stunning thriller that examines the intellectual and moral quandaries of relying on evolving technology.

However, with as many as seven subplots spinning, any clear messages were lost. The audience becomes an unwilling participant in the ever-looping roller-coaster ride, which rolls over itself for 120 minutes.

Set in the final days of December 1999, the United States has become a police state where end of the world doom-sayers are calling for history to begin again.

The murder of an outspoken black rights leader, portrayed charismatically by Glenn Plummer, plays off the juice of the recent anti-LAPD climate and racial divisiveness.

Lenny Nero, played by Ralph Fiennes, is at the center of the chaos. Decked out like a swashbuckling pimp, former vice cop Nero peddles the high-grade sleaze of microchip playback memories.

Borrowing the general premise of "Total Recall," each live, pure and uncut cerebral cortex recording allows wire-trip junkies the full sensation of the chosen experience through a squid-like head piece.

Fiennes' renews his aptitude for playing brilliant, substantial but tragically-flawed men in films such as "Schindler's List" and "Quiz Show." However, a few cleverly delivered lines are not enough to spring him from his sad, lost-soul character.

Nero constantly replays chips of his ex-girlfriend, Faith, played by Juliette Lewis. Caught in the world of used emotions, he relives moments of unbridled passion rather than face her exit for another man.

Lewis continues her niche for portraying girlish sirens and giggling monsters in films such as "Cape Fear" and "Natural Born Killers." Sporting her signature loss of virtue, the hopeless Lewis speeds up her damaged-goods routine with new boyfriend, Philo Gant.

Gant, played devilishly by gravel-voiced Michael Wincott from "Robin Hood: Prince of Thieves," draws smoke but no fire for his turn as a brain-trip junkie and the sadistic figurehead for a recording label.

Nero's best friend "Mace," played by Angela Bassett, tries to snap him back to reality. In every scene, she overpowers the other characters with spidery strength, resolve and a grounded sense of self.

In an disturbing twist, Nero and "Mace" seek to uncover the identity of a black-jack chip transmitter who torments Nero. He sends Nero the brutally inhumane playback of a rape and murder of a business associate and then stalks him.

To adequately cover all the political and social questions "Strange Days" attempts to raise, it would need to be a five-part cable-based mini-series. Instead, it does nothing well.

The sweeping shots of manic streets and the ideas which propel "Strange Days" are interesting for the first few minutes. However, the excessive violence and constant hysteria only creates an annoying movie which leaves the confused audience with a headache.

A place to play

by James Dierking

Two K-State students joined about 1,000 others to construct a park for disadvantaged children in southeast Washington, D.C.

"It was more than just a park, it was the first time that attention was put on their community," Staci Luther, senior in human ecology, said.

The project was part of the National Community Service Super Conference Oct. 18-22 that Luther and Patti Bennett, graduate student in geography, attended as representatives of the K-State Community Service Programs Office.

"It was amazing that there were so many people there from all over the country," Bennett said.

The idea to renovate an abandoned lot into the 180-by-60 foot park came from a local organization after a tragedy in that area.

"The kids there had nowhere to play. They were playing in parked cars, and in August, two died because they couldn't get out of one," Luther said.

The cultural differences of the Washington neighborhood shocked most of the volunteers, Luther said.

"It blew my mind to see the way some of these people lived," Luther said.

"The fact that some Americans have to live that way was a real deep knife in my heart."

Several volunteers worked the week before to get the site ready. Then on Saturday, the entire group came together at about 7 a.m. to complete the park.

"It was really rainy. But it was kind of interesting, because it didn't seem to stop anyone," Luther said. "We were covered head-to-toe in mud."

Neighborhood residents and families also helped in the construction.

"The kids were right beside us shoveling and scooping," Luther said.

Volunteers said the experience was a valuable one that created memories for them and the residents of the neighborhood.

"This will be with them forever. These kids may never see me again, but they'll remember me as that girl from Kansas who helped build their park," Luther said.

Luther and Bennett said they encourage others to become involved in community service.

This year, the K-State Community Service Programs Office has connected almost 500 students with public service projects.

"Through our office, we try to provide K-State students with volunteer opportunities that give them a meaningful experience," said Carol Peak, director of Community Service Programs.

The office has a catalog that allows students to find an area they want to volunteer with.

"In terms of regents schools, we are the oldest and probably the only structured service organization in the state," Peak said.

Volunteers said becoming involved was an important part of their life.

"It's something that's so rewarding that once you become involved, you can't believe why you didn't do it before," Luther said.

► CURRICULUM

Students may have to take general education classes

Jeni Pruitt
staff reporter

K-State is being urged to implement a general-education proposal that would require incoming freshmen to take 18 hours in general-education courses.

The proposal is an effort to train K-State students to think more analytically and improve communication and problem-solving skills.

General education classes would emphasize active learning and group activities and would foster connections to other areas of thought.

Although the plan would place more requirements on incoming freshmen, in most cases, it would not increase the total number of hours needed for graduation, Vicki Clegg, assistant director of educational advancement, said.

For example, students who are required to take Principles of Macroeconomics could use the course to fulfill both their general-education requirements and their social science requirements.

"In my mind, all courses ought to be taught like this," John Havlin, Faculty Senate president, said. "Too often students are told, 'Here's the book. Here's the assignment. Go memorize the material, and we'll see what you can spit back.' Are you enhancing your communication skills or problem solving? It's not likely."

The North Central Accreditation Team and the Kansas Board of Regents are putting pressure on the University to implement general-education requirements.

"The North Central Accreditation Team cited KSU for an inadequate general-education curriculum and for failure to make progress in this area," David Balk, chair of the General Education Implementation Task Force, said during the October Senate meeting.

"The Kansas Board of Regents made it plain that KSU must produce a plan and a means to assess it."

The nation-wide movement toward a general-education curriculum addresses employers' growing complaints that students are too specialized and lack communication, analytical and problem-solving skills.

"Employers consistently praise KSU graduates for specialized competency but note that they lack a breadth of knowledge, have trouble solving problems calling for analytic skills, seem inept at synthesizing information in written or oral form and experience problems contributing to group and team efforts," Balk wrote in an Oct. 5 letter to John Johnson, the chairman for the Faculty Senate Academic Affairs Committee.

"They often seem clueless to express viewpoints at odds with their own. These shortcomings are noted across the country, not only among KSU graduates," Balk said.

Balk said the general-education project allows existing expertise and resources to be used to address deficiencies without creating an unrealistic number of new courses or replicating an unrealistic number of sections of existing courses.

Senate's motion to implement the general-education proposal was tabled at its October meeting but is expected to be passed in November.

"It's likely to pass. Everyone expects it and wants it to, but it's unlikely that it will be put into effect for next fall," Gerald Reeck, biochemistry senator, said.

The motion calls for the implementation of general-education requirements beginning with all incoming freshmen in the fall 1997 and would be reevaluated after four years.

The motion also calls for the general education task force, formed by the Academic Affairs Committee two years ago to oversee the approval of all general-education courses, to distribute general-education program criteria to colleges by the end of this semester.

The individual colleges would be required to begin developing general-education courses in the spring 1996 semester.

Many senators and department leaders said they have doubts about the effectiveness of the proposal.

People have said they are concerned some colleges won't be able to offer enough general-education classes to fulfill the 18-hour requirement.

As a result, classes could be overcrowded and difficult to get into.

So far, 79 classes have been approved by the task forces, 66 have been rejected and 54 are in the process of being submitted.

"The requirements won't affect a lot of colleges like the College of Arts and Sciences," said Mark Tomb, former student representative on the task force, "but currently, the engineering and architecture colleges aren't able to find and get enough classes approved."

Jim Legg, physics senator and opponent of the measure, said it's too early to put the plan into effect.

"If you do the numbers, you can see that 70 courses would have to have over 100 enrolled in them," Legg said. "We need 200 courses in place in order for this to work."

"In two years, that's barely possible. For the program to work, they'll have to do twice as much as they did over the past year."

Balk said he is confident there will be enough general-education courses offered by 1997. However, the closed sections are a serious problem the University must deal with, he said.

"I wouldn't have made the motion if I didn't think there would be a sufficient number of courses by that time," Balk said, "but the issue of closed sections won't go away. It's a serious problem, but it's not unique to general education. It will begin to haunt the University in the not too distant future if it's not resolved."

Other faculty members said the proposal does not solve for the core issue of increasing the quality of education.

Jim Hamilton, philosophy senator, was the only senator to vote against last April's Senate motion to go ahead with the development of the general-education plans.

He said although the plan will solve the University's accreditation problems, it would not help students develop their communication and analytical skills.

"I don't think that this particular project meets or is capable of meeting the real need here," Hamilton said. "I think we owe it to students to teach them how to read, write and think critically."

"The general education requirement does not have a writing component to it because it is suggesting that we have classes with 200 to 300 students in them. It's difficult for students to walk into a 300-member class and say, 'I demand to be taught how to write in this class.'"

► GENERAL EDUCATION

Senators support change in requirements

Jeni Pruitt
staff reporter

Student senators in the Academic Affairs Committee pledged their support of a general-education proposal in a 12-0-1 vote Monday night.

The vote was taken after David Balk, chairman of the General Education Implementation Task Force, answered questions from the senators and encouraged student input in developing the general-education proposal.

The proposal, if passed by Faculty Senate in its November meeting, would require the fall 1997 freshmen to take 18 hours in general-education courses to graduate.

Balk said general-education classes would differ from other required classes in a curriculum because the professor would require practical application of the material.

"That doesn't mean that I won't lecture," Balk said, "but there are points when I want the students to apply what they are learning, and I must also bring in other courses into the class. For example, I have to figure out how this fits into philosophy and history."

Balk said the task force wanted student input about the general-education proposal.

"We have a huge task ahead of us because in four or five years, we're supposed to be able to show that it has made a difference for students," Balk said. "Students are the stakeholders in this. We need their input."

Student senators had several questions about the proposal.

Ryan Kerschen, engineering senator, asked if there would be enough general-education classes offered for technical majors.

"In the College of Engineering, there's one class being offered for general education, and it's an honors class," he said.

Balk said other faculty in his college shared Kerschen's concern, but he didn't think it would be impossible for technical majors to come up with the 18 hours.

"There are faculty in your college who are arguing that 18 hours cannot be found," he said. "The 18 hours were chosen by an engineering dean who said that the department could get 18 hours of general-education courses in the curriculum."

Balk said the proposal would initially need 100 sections of general-education courses approved in order to serve the projected 3,100 incoming fall 1997 freshmen.

Chris Jones, landscape architecture senator, said he didn't think the task force would have trouble finding enough general-education courses, and he was looking forward to taking classes outside of his concentration.

"If you go back and look at the classes you've taken now, you'd be surprised how many of them you'd probably be able to use as general-education classes in the future. There's going to be plenty of classes. I have no worries."

Wendy Garrett, human ecology senator, said she was concerned about the workload the general-education courses would place on students.

"Are you concerned that you'll overwhelm students with group projects?" Garrett asked Balk. "The thought of more group projects makes my stomach churn."

"All my peers are sick of group projects. We're getting too much of this already."

Balk said group projects would be incorporated into general education, and they were a necessary part of the curriculum because it was a skill that was applicable to the real world.

Wendy Strevey, arts and science senator, asked if students with double majors would be able to count general-education courses taken in different colleges for both majors.

Balk said he hoped it would, but this is one concern that hadn't been brought up by the task force. He said he would look into it.

However, Balk said students with only one major probably wouldn't be allowed to take general-education courses inside their own department.

"The whole notion of general education is to give you some breadth," he said. "If all your general-education courses are taken in your major, it defeats the purpose of general education."

After the question session ended, the senators voiced support for the proposal.

"I don't see anything wrong with this," Aubrey Abbott, arts and science senator and Student Senate representative to Faculty Senate, said. "They should be teaching this way already."

Kerschen, the senator who abstained from the vote, said he opposed the proposal for personal reasons.

"I'm not strongly against it. It's just the principle," he said. "I think that you make yourself the best person you can, and if you need to take speech and group skills classes to make yourself better, you should do it."

"But when you mandate it, you go against what you're trying to promote. Enrollment in those classes will go up, and this hurts the environment that they're trying to promote."

CIVIL ENGINEERING

Donation allows department to refurbish conference room

Jamie Willey
staff reporter

The Department of Civil Engineering recently received a $10,000 contribution from an engineering consulting company to refurbish a conference room in Seaton Hall.

Stuart Swartz, head of civil engineering, said Wilson and Company asked the college in the spring to prepare a list of items that needed fixing in the Murray A. Wilson conference room.

"They just thought the room needed to be fixed up a little different," Swartz said.

The company originally contributed money to refurbish the conference room in 1967, and the room was dedicated to Murray Wilson, a 1922 K-State civil engineering graduate and co-founder of Wilson and Company.

Since then, the company has updated the room once or twice since 1967, Swartz said.

"Our company established a Murray A. Wilson room at civil engineering back in the late '60s. We as a company have many graduates from K-State, and we wanted to contribute to acknowledge the part the K-State graduates have played in our company," said Jerry May, partner of Wilson and Company in charge of operations in Wichita.

Four out of eight of the company's owners are K-State civil engineering graduates, May said.

About 40 or 50 of the company's 270 employees are K-State graduates as well, he said.

"We find out that, by and large, K-State engineering students get a good education. They are usually Midwest-type folks. They have a good work ethic, and they fit our image," May said.

Wilson and Company gave a $10,000 check to the KSU Foundation, and the check was earmarked for the remodel of the conference room.

Lakshmi Reddi, associate professor of civil engineering, said the money is already being spent. New chairs have been purchased and delivered, he said.

May said the department plans to clean and paint the walls, install new carpet and bookshelves, buy new video equipment, buy new projection equipment and buy new decorations.

The conference room is used for faculty meetings, research meetings and student organizations meetings, Swartz said.

Students are also allowed to use the room for studying when no one else is using it, he said.

Reddi said the department prepared a list of what they thought needed repaired and replaced. Reddi said the list added up to a little more than $10,000. Reddi said the department will pay for any repairs or new equipment exceeding the $10,000.

The department is still shopping and they may not need any extra money, he said.

The renovations are expected to be complete within a month, Reddi said.

and sciences senator, for excessive absences.

Potter said in a letter to Tribunal he wanted the interpretation because it had been several years since impeachment proceedings had been brought before Senate and people's unfamiliarity with the process was hampering current impeachment proceedings.

According to the SGA By-laws, if a senator has three or more unexcused absences, the Operations Committee will have a hearing to consider the possible impeachment of the senator.

The Senate chair determines if absences are excused.

The by-laws state that if the committee confirms grounds for impeachment, it will write impeachment legislation that will go before Senate.

Two-thirds of Senate must vote to advance the impeachment proceeding. Tribunal hears the impeachment case and makes a decision on whether to remove the senator from SGA.

Potter said he thought if there were three unexcused absences, the committee should automatically sponsor a bill of impeachment.

Members of the committee said they thought the committee should serve as a check on the chair. The committee voted not to sponsor the legislation because it said one of Henry's absences should have been excused.

Tribunal interpreted the phrase confirm grounds to mean Senate and the committee was supposed to review records and evidence to determine if there is sufficient evidence to send an impeachment case on to Tribunal.

"They are supposed to ask if there are three absences — yes or no," Ben Clouse, Tribunal chancellor, said.

Mary Wood, faculty member of Tribunal, said she saw Senate and the committee's responsibilities to be similar to a grand jury's.

The Tribunal members said they did not think the committee or Senate should have the authority to overrule the decision of the chair on absences because that power is specifically given to the chair in the by-laws.

Edward Pokorski, student member of Tribunal, said he thought the only way a person would receive a fair hearing would be if impeachment cases were tried by Tribunal where the accused would have an opportunity to adequately present a case in their defense.

He said he did not think that could happen in a committee meeting or on the Senate floor because of speaking privileges.

The second way senators can be impeached is by a motion by a senator or committee.

After the Senate Operations Committee voted not to author impeachment legislation, Potter said he would sponsor impeachment legislation against Henry.

However, Senate Operations reviews all legislation.

Tricia Nolfi, student activities and services coordinator, said the committee would have the power to recommend the bill favorably, unfavorably or hold the bill in committee.

"It would be their responsibility to ask if there is evidence, not to weigh evidence," she said.

If the committee tried to hold the bill, Senate could pull the bill out of committee with a two-thirds vote.

Past response to the program was favorable, she said.

Coffman said her hall is excited

"We do this every year, so it's a big deal," Coffman said.

Residents said the program is something they can do for the community.

QUEBEC

Louise Beaudoin, culture minister in Quebec's separatist government. "We had 9 percent more than we had in 1980. Something has to be done."

About 82 percent of Quebecers are French-speaking, and roughly 60 percent of them voted for separation. As expected, roughly 90 percent of English-speaking and immigrant Quebecers voted No.

The vote will leave scars in Quebec. But it will hearten the throngs of Canadians from other provinces who joined marches, rallies and vigils last week beseeching Quebec to stay.

A separatist victory would have spelled economic turmoil for Canada — and perhaps the greatest political crisis of its history. The nation would have lost one-fourth of its people and one-sixth of its land, a fracture without precedent among prosperous Western democracies.

The narrow federalist victory will leave Quebec bitterly divided, with defeated nationalists likely to seek scapegoats and plot a future campaign to achieve a sovereign, French-speaking nation.

The turnout, after a passionate campaign, was exceptionally large: 92 percent of the roughly 5 million registered voters.

In Verdun, a working-class suburb of Montreal, unemployed Bertrand Fontaine, 48, explained his Yes vote.

"I worked 18 years for a company, and now I've been unemployed for two years," he said. "That's enough. Maybe with new companies here, I'd have new chances. I have nothing to lose."

Annette Dupuis, 83, said she was proud to cast a No vote in the Montreal suburb of Anjou.

"My country is Canada," she said. "This is very important to me. If the Yes vote wins... I will shed tears. It will be the death of Canada."

Prime Minister Jean Chretien, a Quebecer committed to keeping Canada intact, voted in his hometown of Shawinigan, but offered no predictions.

The separatists' most charismatic voice, parliamentary opposition leader Lucien Bouchard, said Quebecers should take pride in the campaign — one of the few times in world history where citizens were offered a vote on whether to secede.

"We demonstrated in Quebec that we are a democracy — that we can talk to each other," Bouchard said.

The separatists trailed early in the campaign, which started in September.

They pulled into a narrow lead in opinion polls after Bouchard, who lost a leg to a near-fatal disease last year, took charge of the campaign and galvanized supporters with emotional speeches.

The federalists steadied themselves in the closing week with rallies across Canada that expressed support for Quebecers and national unity.

By the end, pollsters said the race was a dead heat. And they were right. They had given an edge to the separatists among decided voters but suggested a majority of the undecided voters could tilt toward staying in Canada.

"I'm hopeful for the No," Elizabeth Stewart said after voting in a largely anglo Montreal neighborhood. "I have a lot of relatives who are French-speaking and are on the No side — they just don't say it in public."

Chretien's federal government had refused to say how it would respond to a Yes vote.

The separatists, had they won, would not have declared independence immediately. They had offered to negotiate for up to a year on a new economic and political partnership between Canada and an independent Quebec.

BREAST IMPLANTS

Dow to pay $10 million in damages

Associated Press

RENO, Nev. — Dow Chemical Co. must pay $10 million in punitive damages to a woman who blames her ill health on leaky silicone breast implants, a jury ruled Monday.

The Washoe District Court jury on Saturday awarded Charlotte Mahlum $3.9 million to compensate her for her losses. It deliberated only 45 minutes Monday before awarding the additional damages as punishment for wrongdoing.

"I'm stunned. Maybe now these big companies — these doctors — will understand we're not crazy, we're sick," Mahlum said after the verdict. "There is no amount of money whatsoever that could give me back my health."

Her lawyers had asked for $12 million, saying that the conduct of Dow Chemical was criminal.

Saturday's verdict was the first reached solely against the parent company of Dow Corning Corp., which for years was the leading manufacturer of silicone breast implants.

Dow Chemical's financial experts testified Monday that the company was worth between $8 billion and $9 billion, although they tried to show that Dow Corning lost money on breast implants.

The jury already has found that Dow Chemical gave Dow Corning substantial assistance or encouragement by testing materials used in breast implants.

Dow Chemical spokesman John Musser said this was only the second time his company has been to trial on an implant lawsuit and the first time it had been the sole defendant in such a case.

Earlier this year, a Houston jury awarded a woman and her husband $5.2 million in a similar lawsuit, holding Dow Chemical 20-percent liable and Dow Corning 80-percent liable. A judge later overruled the verdict against Dow Chemical, freeing it from having to pay a share of the award.

Marsha J. Rabiteau, a Dow Chemical lawyer, said her company will appeal unless Judge Connie Steinheimer decides to set aside the latest jury award.

During the four-week trial, Dow Chemical lawyers argued the company never made or distributed silicone breast implants. They claimed they were made by Dow Corning and Dow Chemical couldn't be held responsible for the actions of an independent company.

Dow Chemical, based in Midland, Mich., and Corning Inc. of Corning, N.Y., are co-owners of Dow Corning.

Dow Corning was dropped from the Reno lawsuit after it filed for bankruptcy protection in May, saying it lacked the resources to fight claims by thousands of women who blame implants for health problems.

Mahlum, 46, who lives in Elko, sued Dow Chemical and Dow Corning in 1993, alleging her implant caused skin disorders, muscle pain, tremors, incontinence and other problems. The jury also awarded $200,000 in compensatory damages to her husband, Marvin.

Scientists are still debating whether silicone breast implants really make anyone sick. Just last week, the American College of Rheumatology issued a statement saying that there was no compelling evidence to support the claim that the implants put women at risk. Others who support women's lawsuits against implant makers dispute that.

Video added to audio-only connection

Karrin Thomas
staff reporter

Starting in January, TELENET will offer classes with a whole new dimension.

TELENET 2, a statewide education system operated by the Kansas Regents Network, will add video interaction to the traditional audio-based distance learning program.

TELENET classes have been offered for the past 25 years all across Kansas using live audio interaction between instructors and students in different locations.

Next semester, the first classes using desktop videoconferencing technology will be offered in place of the traditional audio-only connection.

There will initially be about 30 host sites around Kansas.

"TELENET 2 is the first statewide system to comprehensively use desktop videoconferencing," said Bert Biles, who is currently staffing K-State's Technology Task Force.

The task force prepares proposals to implement new technologies.

Desktop videoconferencing is an integration of desktop computing, television and telephone, Biles said.

Desktop videoconferencing runs off a Pentium-based personal computer equipped for multimedia uses. Special desktop videoconferencing software and hardware, including a video camera and speaker phone, are also required.

Equipment reported stolen from Umberger

About $6,720 worth of computer equipment was stolen from Umberger Hall. Roger Terry, coordinator for information and educational technology and weather data library in the Department of Communications, reported the computers missing Monday afternoon.

The computers are stored in the Department of Communications in Umberger Hall. Terry discovered the theft when some of the computers did not turn on. $1,320 worth of computer chips and other computer parts were stolen. Two Gateway laptop computers were also stolen at a loss of $5,400.

According to Richard Herrman, investigator with the K-State Police Department, the theft could have occurred between Sept. 28 and Monday. The Department of Communications didn't realize the computers were gone until then, Herrman said.

The computers are used for cooperative extension personnel and agriculture personnel in service programs.

Greeks, residence halls search for winning spirit routines

Phil Roberts
staff reporter

Ahearn Field House is swarming with students this week during the final preparations of Homecoming Week's body building competition.

Greeks and residence halls all over campus have formed teams to compete in organized cheerleading routines, building spirit and enthusiasm.

The Kappa Kappa Gammas are stomping, clapping and chanting with FarmHouse and Theta Xi members every night this week at Ahearn for their body building performance, which they said is better than ever.

"This year has been out of this world," said Heather Heidrick, junior in elementary education and Homecoming chairman for the Kappas. "It has been nothing but positive. There are really a lot of hard workers out there."

Each group devotes hundreds of hours to the body building effort, sculpting the perfect routine that can boost their Homecoming points over the top.

"We started right after Labor Day weekend," said Justin Myers, freshman in arts and sciences undecided and body building chairman of Theta Xi. "We didn't do it last year, so it's been a great experience."

During the first weeks of practice, the Kappas, Theta Xis and FarmHouse members practiced three nights a week for about two hours, Pete May, sophomore in agricultural technology management and FarmHouse member, said.

"But, now we have been going for about four nights a week for two hours," he said.

Heidrick said the level of enthusiasm was enormous and everyone expects to win the competition.

"We were able to learn the crowd chant in 30 minutes," Heidrick said. "Our routine has always been mediocre, but the dancers really put us over the top."

Adrienne Tijerina, sophomore in elementary education, has put a lot of time and energy into the competition as the body building coach, although she is not able to compete in the body building competition because she is a member of the varsity cheerleader squad.

Students, faculty focus on week of activities

Nate Schilling

While the Cats are gearing up for Saturday's Homecoming game against Oklahoma, students and faculty are doing their own warming up during this week's Homecoming festivities.

"Homecoming is second to none when it comes to school spirit," said Matt Urbanek, vice president of external affairs for Greek Affairs. "There is an enormous amount of spirit out there, all building up for Thursday and Friday's competitions in Ahearn."

The Homecoming body building competition takes place Thursday evening with the finals round Friday evening.

In addition, the pant-the-ant competition will be Friday, with the other Homecoming spirit projects being judged this week.

Urbanek said the competitions were divided into two divisions — greek houses and cooperatives, like residence halls.

"The greeks generally have more participation overall," Urbanek said. "The houses tend to require a lot of support from their members."

Practice for many of the groups participating in the body building event began in September, and many hours of planning, practicing and perfecting have been taking place since then.

"We've been practicing our dance routine for body building six to eight hours a week and many long nights," Stephanie Johnson, junior in advertising, said. "I think all the effort and time will be worth it come the competition."

Although many students are not involved in Homecoming activities, they still support the school spirit.

"I live off campus and am not involved with the activities," Jana Neufeld, junior in advertising, said. "But I think it's good for other people, especially the greeks, to promote it."

Detroit douses Devil's Night fires

Nearly 35,000 volunteers helped prevent widespread fires in Detroit by patrolling areas of the city prone to "Devil's Night" arson. The pre-Halloween mischief reached its worst point in the 1980s and prompted an anti-arson campaign.

On a given night, Detroit averages 50 fires.

Worst on record: Devil's Night 1985 297 fires

1994 182 fires

1995 41 fires

Detroit's anti-arson efforts:

- 1,800 vacant buildings razed
- 2,000 abandoned cars towed
- 190,000 tires (used as fuel) discarded
- Limited gasoline sales
- Awareness campaign

Detroit citizens help deter Devil's Night fires

Associated Press

DETROIT — Thousands of volunteers who patrolled streets were credited with thwarting widespread fires in the pre-Halloween arson spree called Devil's Night.

The Detroit News reported that 41 fires had been confirmed at midnight, far fewer than 182 reported last year and the 297 that burned in 1985 when the burnings of trash piles and houses peaked.

"The force on the street makes a difference," Deputy Fire Chief Charles Curry said as he joined about 35,000 volunteers Monday night outside an abandoned apartment building. "It seems to be helping."

Among the volunteers was J.J. Webster, a 42-year-old cook who said he was inspired by the recent Million Man March.

"There's a new spirit of determination by black men in the city," he said.

"We're not going to allow Detroit to be embarrassed again."

The city, which on any day has 40 to 60 fires, did not have updated numbers on fires or arson arrests early Tuesday. New figures were to be released today.

Stung by last year's failure to keep Devil's Night arson down, Mayor Dennis Archer this year signed up thousands of volunteers to patrol neighborhoods, launched an extensive awareness campaign and limited the dispensing of gasoline in portable containers in the days leading up to Devil's Night.

Also, in the past two months, the city has demolished more than 1,800 vacant buildings, towed more than 2,000 abandoned cars and removed 190,000 discarded tires to keep them from being used as fuel.

Devil's Night has long been a night of mischief in Detroit, but escalated in the 1980s, and it did not decline until then-

Mayor Coleman Young started an intensive anti-arson campaign.

This year's campaign to extinguish Devil's Night came amid something of an economic resurgence for Detroit. The city is experiencing the biggest housing boom since the 1950s, with plans to build a $235-million downtown stadium for the Detroit Tigers.

However, a night of fires is no longer confined to Detroit.

In Camden, N.J., about 3,000 people volunteered to help in the city's campaign to stamp out what's known as Mischief Night.

The impoverished city of about 87,000 residents across the Delaware River from Philadelphia avoided a repeat of 1991 when 133 fires were reported. Six building fires were reported late Monday.

"We can truly say it's an entire community effort," Mayor Arnold Webster said.

N.Y. MAN SPENDS 3 DAYS IN JAIL FOR 4 OVERDUE LIBRARY BOOKS

NORWOOD, N.Y. — A judge threw the book at a man who failed to return library books he checked out four years ago.

Christopher M. Ashley, 23, spent three days in the St. Lawrence County jail on petty larceny charges before being released Monday, the Watertown Daily Times reported.

The books, an almanac, an atlas and two hardcover novels, are worth $77.85, according to Marcia L. Murray, director of the Norwood Public Library.

It was the first time Murray had ever sought someone's arrest for overdue books. Usually, a barrage of notices and the threat of a jail stay is enough to get the books or money back, she said.

Police Chief Dale J. Wells said he didn't take any kind of crime lightly.

"There is a law that says if you take books from a library and do not return them or reimburse them, it is petty larceny," Wells said.

Ashley said he would have returned the books if he knew where they were or paid the library if he had the money.

JAMES BROWN CHARGED WITH DOMESTIC VIOLENCE, SERVES JAIL TIME

AIKEN, S.C. (AP) — Singer James Brown, who has had several run-ins with the law and served time in prison, was back in jail again Tuesday on a domestic violence charge after his wife said he assaulted her.

Aiken County sheriff's authorities charged Brown, 62, with criminal domestic violence after his wife, Adrienne, called 911 asking for medical help, sheriff's spokesman Don Biermann said.

Deputies arrested the singer, and his wife was taken to Aiken Regional Medical Centers, Biermann said. He refused to comment further. A hospital spokeswoman said Adrienne Brown was treated and released.

In December, Brown turned himself in to Aiken County authorities after being accused of shoving his wife during an argument. A magistrate dismissed the charge in March when Adrienne Brown refused to testify.

Brown served nearly three years in prison after he was arrested in September 1988 for leading police on a car chase between South Carolina and Georgia. It began when a gun-toting Brown stormed an insurance agency next to his Augusta, Ga., office and claimed strangers were using his bathroom.

Tests later showed Brown had used the illegal hallucinogen PCP.

The Browns have been married for more than 10 years.

INTEL CORP. INTRODUCES 6TH-GENERATION COMPUTER CHIP

SAN JOSE, Calif. — Intel Corp. is about to turn the crank again.

The world's largest maker of computer chips will begin selling the Pentium Pro today, the sixth generation of a chip family that dates to 1979 and is the main component of personal computers.

"It's son of Pentium, the next generation," said Daniel Klesken, an analyst with Robertson, Stephens & Co. in San Francisco.

Pentium Pro, code-named P6, will be used first in powerful computers aimed at businesses. Eventually, it will improve the ability of home PCs to handle multimedia and other power-hungry software.

The new chip delivers more performance because it makes decisions about how to carry out multiple instructions in an efficient order.

Pentium merely carries out instructions in the sequence they are given.

Intel has declined to reveal pricing or other details until Pentium Pro's unveiling in San Francisco. Several PC makers — including IBM, Compaq, Hewlett-Packard and Dell — will announce new computers that use the chip.

Several large systems makers, including Unisys and Data General, will use it on bigger machines.

Shoppers for home PCs shouldn't expect to see Pentium Pro any time soon.

"I think the Pentium is going to be the product of choice clear through '95 and '96," Klesken said. "But you'll find (the Pentium Pro) in both the desktop and notebook in the '97-98 time frame."

Pentium Pro has 5.5 million transistors, compared with the Pentium's 3.1 million, which allows it to run programs faster. The first chip runs at 150 megahertz but increasingly fleet Pentium Pros, exceeding 250 MHz, are expected next year.

Pentium, now available at speeds up to 133 MHz and soon 150 MHz, was released in 1993 at a then-blistering 60 MHz.

Intel, which keeps building chip factories, is already working on Pentium Pro's successor, code-named P7, in collaboration with Hewlett-Packard.

Chimes stresses trust, cooperation at MHS

Nicole Kirby
staff reporter

Freshmen at Manhattan High School learned how to trust each other with a little help from K-State Chimes junior honorary Tuesday.

As part of Manhattan High's career day activities, Chimes junior honorary conducted a leadership workshop.

"I think we can show them how we are from small high schools and got involved," said Chimes member Keri Barrow, junior in secondary education. "We can show them how they can get involved and work up to a success later on."

Chimes Service Chairman Justin Kastner, junior in food science, said the committee put on a skit and played some games designed to encourage trust and cooperation.

Brook Donley, junior in pre-physical therapy, said trust was significant.

"Trust is something that is really important in leadership and when you get involved," she said.

One game encouraged trust by putting students, one at a time, in the middle of a circle of their peers. The game required asking the students in the circle to close their eyes and try not to move their feet while the others pushed them back and forth. Most of the students who tried the game took a step forward to maintain their balance.

In another game, the Chimes members asked some blindfolded students, who had a number whispered in their ears, to arrange themselves in numerical order without talking.

"You're going to have to find another way to communicate what your number is," Donley told them.

The first group tapped each other on the hands and shoulders, but they were not in order when they finished. The second group used the same method but was much more successful.

Tom Edwards, freshman at Manhattan High, said he did not see the value in the exercise.

"This game is pretty dumb," he said. But he said the next game was more amusing.

In this activity, one Chimes member and two Manhattan High freshmen left the room and were fitted with headbands that said "disagree with me," "laugh at me," "agree with me" or "ignore me."

Unaware of what their foreheads said, the students entered the room and began to talk about something while the audience responded according to the headband.

Chris Hansen, junior in nuclear engineering, began to speak about his major but was bombarded with shouts of "no, you're not!" and "engineering sucks."

When asked what he thought his headband said, his guess was close to the actual inscription of "disagree with me."

"I think it says 'deny everything I say,'" Hansen said.

Nate Dorsett, freshman at Manhattan High, said he thought the exercises were worthwhile.

"We learn a way to get along with people," he said. Deloris Berland, an English teacher at Manhattan High, said the workshop was a good idea.

"I think it gets a group of students together that often don't get to meet during the day. Second, they get to meet some students from the University that can be role models for them," Berland said.

SEX OFFENDER CHARGED WITH SENDING EXPLICIT LETTER; TRIAL DATE SET

A Manhattan man will go to trial in January on charges of aggravated indecent solicitation of a child.

Mark Hansen's jury trial date was set for Jan. 30-31 during an arraignment hearing Monday at the Riley County Courthouse.

Hansen was arrested March 31 for violating conditions of his Pottawatomie County probation after giving a sexually explicit letter to an 8-year-old Manhattan girl.

Riley County lists Hansen as a regular sex offender under Kansas law.

Steven Opat, Hansen's defense attorney, issued a motion to withdraw at Monday's arraignment. The motion will be heard at 10:30 a.m. Nov. 16 at the Riley County Courthouse.

Opat said he could not comment on the motion because it was a matter of attorney-client privilege.

Detroit sets example Manhattan should follow

The Manhattan community doesn't have to leave the crime fighting entirely up to the police.

Perhaps there is a way to keep streets safe.

Detroit has shown the country that with enough community support, crime can be thwarted.

Detroit has been infamous for its "Devil's Night," the night before Halloween. As many as 297 fires have been set in the city in one night's time, killing and injuring citizens and destroying property.

This year, with the help of 35,000 volunteers patrolling the streets and other precautions, Detroit escaped with only 41 fires set, far fewer than the 182 set last year.

People are beginning to say enough is enough.

Unfortunately, crime in Detroit and Camden had to get really bad before it got better.

This doesn't have to happen in Manhattan.

Manhattan has become a city where a year can't go by without multiple rapes and beatings, and sometimes even murder.

A year can't go by without gang-related vandalism.

At Manhattan Middle School, the students can't even bring backpacks to class for security reasons.

The Manhattan community doesn't have to leave the crime fighting entirely up to the police.

Detroit didn't, and it made the difference.

By getting involved in neighborhood watch groups, joining the campus escort service and helping in groups such as Big Brothers/Big Sisters, Manhattan can protect its community.

Manhattan won't ever be a Detroit. But it should learn by Detroit's efforts that the community has more control than the criminals.

Lacking intelligence,

Separatist groups create unrest

I had an old Chinese curse put on me when I was quite small. The curse was an Irish guy, but I think it still holds. "May your life never be dull," he intoned to me — the curse.

Thanks, Grandpa, I really needed that. All this time, I thought he liked me.

Until recently, I thought the curse hadn't stuck. Maybe only the Chinese can use that spell.

But the interesting thing about that particular curse is that it is time-delayed. Curse a child, and they don't feel the effects until sometime into their late teens.

One day, suddenly, things just get too interesting.

Buildings have exploded, trains have derailed, hot-air balloonists have been shot, all the world's leaders had a nice, quiet, little meeting in the middle of New York City, Canada tried to split in two, and — if you listen to certain people — government conspiracies have been popping up like mushrooms in a damp basement.

Is anyone else a little nervous?

I've been sort of keeping an eye on the conspiracy theorists since the Oklahoma City bombing. My favorite one so far is a group in Texas who claim the government is controlling the weather and other natural phenomenon like earthquakes, so they can also control the economy.

For the most part, I think they've all smelled a little too much gunpowder. But there's this little voice in the back of my head that keeps screaming, "What if they are right?"

What if it's true the government is plotting to take away all our personal freedom? What if they are sitting in a tree outside Kedzie Hall watching what I write and reporting back to whomever? (Maybe they know why it's always so darn hot in here.)

A friend of mine went to a gun show in Kansas City last weekend. He said that right next to the National Rifle Association's table was a table for a right-wing group and some "Remember Waco, Remember Ruby Ridge" posters. They were trying to drum up a little support and some cash.

Ten years ago, actually more like three years ago, they would have never admitted in public to trying to separate from the government.

Domestic terrorism by Americans was completely unheard of, and the Unabomber was still the scariest guy in the FBI files.

History shows this will get worse before it gets better.

The new century is on the way, and a large percentage of people believe the world will end shortly after.

Why 2,000 years is the magic number is open to many opinions.

So, what do we do? I have taken comfort in facts. The average education of most of the people involved in separatist groups is high-school level or below.

The majority are blue-collar workers, and the ones who seem to do most of the damage and get most of the publicity are small splinter groups or individuals.

They all seem to make literal interpretations of the Bible, and none of them can adequately explain how a universal health-care plan will take away the Bill of Rights.

If anyone thinks they can explain this, please e-mail me. (grey.ksu.ksu.edu)

The other night I was ranting about where the world is heading and was politely reminded there's not a thing I can do about it besides stick my head in the sand or leave the country.

I was also given this quote as a sort of comforting thought, "Never attribute to malice what can be explained by stupidity."

Powell exemplifies ideal candidate

Independent political candidates for the presidency have never had much luck attaining as many votes as their Republican or Democratic competitors.

He is, in short, a man who walks the middle road. He is pro-choice and does not align himself with the overzealous religious right that possesses ever-growing ties with the Republican party. He is soft-spoken and extremely intelligent.

Powell has qualities that, even if he doesn't win, will open the eyes of mainstream voters as to what good qualities an individual should have.

The two main factors concerning his candidacy are which party he will run with and if he will run at all.

Bob Dole has said that should Powell run as a Republican, it would squeeze out every candidate except for himself and Powell.

Given Powell's stance on abortion and affirmative action, most conservatives would align themselves under Dole's banner. At least, this is what Dole hopes would happen.

Powell running on the Democratic ticket isn't feasible.

To begin with, he isn't the incumbent.

Clinton's faults weren't highlighted by his own party in the 1992 Democratic convention; this year they will be. And although the Democrats were sent spinning after the last congressional elections, they will still support Clinton.

Running as an independent is slowly becoming less of a possibility. Although Perot invited Powell to join his new political party, Powell is too smart to join up with an upstart ideology.

Just because he stands apart from Dole and Clinton does not mean he is a radical. In all likelihood, if Powell runs, he will run as a Republican.

The popular conception of American politics is that the entire process and system has become stagnant.

However, we are still living in interesting times.

To predict who will win the 1996 election is difficult. I never thought

Bush would win in 1988 when the primaries first began. Nevertheless, Americans might have the chance for something new, which would be the historical prospect of an independent candidate who will be more than a statement — he will be a genuine person of outstanding character.

That is something that goes beyond a simple debate and becomes a truth. It embodies what every leader should be.

Justin Wild is a senior in English and education.

Despite Teddy Roosevelt's running as a "Bull Moose" and nearly winning, other individuals, like George Wallace, have merely served as dissenting political viewpoints.

When H. Ross Perot ran in 1992, he was transformed by most voters from a candidate into a statement about personal dissatisfaction with the political climate in America. Independent candidates for the presidency have never, in all actuality, been candidates at all.

This factor could possibly change with a new candidate. Colin Powell has long been regarded as a stable man; he achieved notoriety during the Persian Gulf conflict, and his lecture series brought him high dollars and even more fame.

It was inevitable that he be pushed to run for the presidency. There are several factors that could both hurt and help his campaign.

The day of worldwide armed conflicts is at an end. The future of our country's conflicts resides in Bosnia-type situations. Powell's military experience goes beyond the chain of command.

He was also in an artillery unit that experienced combat. He knows the feelings of the common soldier, and as president of the United States, he would be sympathetic to any situation he would advise placing them in.

The flip side of the military coin is the difference between running the military and running the country.

The military is not regarded as a democracy — orders are to be followed. Within America's system of government, the right to question authority is a privilege given to every citizen. In a presidential debate,

Powell's hypothetical ease of transition into office could be a significant weak point.

Another large factor that hinges on Powell's identity is his ethnicity. At a time in America when ethnic lines are drawn, he is viewed by many people as a healer.

Although he didn't condemn Louis

Farrakhan's Million Man March, he made the right choice by keeping the message and the messenger together by condemning Farrakhan's inflammatory statements.

► TOLERANT CHRISTIAN

Editor,

I can't believe that a major in journalism and mass communications is so narrow-minded to the realities of the world.

I am as straight as you can get, and I also believe in God and His almighty power.

However, I don't think a being so supreme could condemn homosexuality as Sarah Lunday said.

Homosexuality has been in the world since the time of the Bible, only it has been hidden.

Today, people have the courage to become true to themselves and each other. But instead of applauding them for their bravery and honesty, they have to encounter people who use God as a tool to frighten them and keep them down.

You should seriously stop and think if you are really entitled to put God's words in your mouth.

As long as you are a non-judgmental, caring and honest person, as long as you acknowledge God in every way, it doesn't matter which gender you love.

Live and let live — God will be thankful for that.

► APPEAL TO COACH SNYDER

Editor,

I am an avid K-State football fan. I also have met a few of the players involved in the incident that was reported in the Collegian.
